ün-clār'-i-fied, a. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. clarified.] Not clarified; not made clear or purified.

"One ounce of whey unclarified, one ounce of oil of vitriol, make no apparent alteration."—Bacon: Phys. Remains.

ün-clasp', v. t. & i. [Pref. un- (2), and Eng. clasp.]

A. Transitive:

1. To unfasten the clasp of; to open, as a thing fastened with, or as with a clasp. (Lit. & fig.)

"Thou know'st no less but all; I have unclasp'd
To thee the book even of my secret soul."
Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, i. 4.

*2. To disclose, to reveal, to lay open.

"In her bosom I'll unclasp my heart."
Shakesp.: Much Ado, i. 1.

B. Intrans.: To let go the hands. (Shakesp.: Pericles, ii. 3.)

ün-class'-a-ble, adj. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. classable.] Incapable of being classed or classified; not admitting of classification.

ün-clāss'-ic, ün-clāss'-ic-āl, adj. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. classic, classical.]

1. Not classical; not resembling the compositions of the classical authors.

"Angel of dullness, sent to scatter round Her magick charms o'er all unclassick ground."
Pope: Dunciad, iii. 258.

2. Not confined to or including the classics.

"An education totally unclassical."—Knox: Liberal Education, § 7.

ün-clāss'-ic-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. unclassical; ly.] Not in a classical manner; not in the manner of the classical authors.

ün'-cle, subst. [Fr. oncle, from Lat. avunculum, accus. of avunculus=a mother's brother, prop.=little grandfather, being a double dimin. from avus=a grandfather; Ger. onkel.]

1. Lit.: The brother of one's father or mother; the husband of one's aunt.

2. Fig.: A pawnbroker. (Slang.)

"Uncles, rich as three golden balls From taking pledges of nations."
Hood: Miss Kilmansegg.

bóil, bóy; pout, jówl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

¶ According to Brewer, Uncle in this sense is a pun on the Latin word uncus=a hook, which pawnbrokers employed to lift articles pawned before spouts were adopted. This, however, is rendered doubtful by the fact that in French slang ma tante (=my aunt) has a similar meaning. The probable allusion is to a mythical rich relative.

¶ Your uncle: A jocose expression equivalent to myself; as, Your uncle is the man to do it, i. e., I am the man to do it.

Uncle Sam, s. The jocular name of the United States government, used as John Bull is with respect to England. It is an extension of the letters U. S. (United States), printed or stamped on the government property. It was first used in Troy, N. Y., in 1812, when certain goods purchased for the government and branded U. S., were officially inspected by Mr. Samuel Wilson, whose local nickname was "Uncle Sam." The coincidence of initials suggested the application of the nickname in full to the government.

ŭn-clēan', un-cleane, un-clene, a. [Prefix un- (1), and Eng. clean.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Not clean; foul, dirty, filthy.
2. Morally foul or impure; wicked, evil; hence, lewd, unchaste.

"Let them all encircle him about,
And, fairy-like too, pinch the unclean knight."
Shakesp.: Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 4.

II. Comparative Religions:

1. Ethnicism: In every ceremonial faith which exists or has existed, distinction exists between what is ceremonially clean and unclean. Food cooked by a Sudra or by an outcast is unclean to the Brahmin, and it is at the peril of his caste if he eat it. He must also avoid unclean persons, as the Pariah, the Mahar, and other outcasts.

2. Judaism: Both things on the one hand, and persons or beings on the other, might be ceremonially unclean. Regarding things, there were unclean places (Lev. xiv. 40), but the word unclean was especially applied to certain articles of food, as the flesh of animals which had died of disease, or been strangled by man, or killed by beasts or birds of prey, certain animals in all circumstances [UNCLEAN-ANIMALS], and blood. (Lev. v. 2, 3; xi. 40, 41; xvii. 10-16; Acts xv. 29.) Regarding persons, one might be made unclean by touching the carcass of an unclean animal of any kind (Lev. v. 2; xi. 26). In some cases this ceremonial defilement was but temporary, continuing only till the evening (xi. 25-28, &c.). Washing the clothes was often an essential step toward the removal of the impurity. A woman giving birth to a man-child was unclean for seven days (xii. 2), and to a female child for fourteen days (xii. 5), the period of uncleanness being much shorter than that of her purification (xii. 4, 5). The leper was unclean till the priest pronounced that his loathsome malady was at an end. (Lev. xiii. 1-59.) [UNCLEAN-SPIRIT.]

3. Christianity: Jesus swept away the doctrine that the eating of certain articles of food, deemed ceremonially impure, involved sin, by His sweeping declaration: "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man, but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man" (Matt. xv. 11; cf. also 12-20; Mark vii. 18); and with regard to persons, St. Peter, after the vision of the sheet let down, would no longer call any man common or unclean (Acts x. 28).

Jewish Antiq.: Certain animals which were regarded as ceremonially unclean, and not therefore to be eaten. Most animals that "chew the cud" might be eaten, with the exception of the camel, the coney [HYRAX], the hare, and the swine, only the first of which is a true ruminant. A number of birds—the "eagle," the "ossifrage," the "vulture," the "kite," &c.—were to be deemed unclean and abominable. Much difficulty arises in identifying some of the birds referred to; but one broad fact is undoubted—that the Raptores were deemed ceremonially impure, while most of the grain-feeding birds were allowed as articles of food. Unclean fishes were those which had not fins or scales. With the exception of what would now be called the Leaping Orthoptera—locusts, grasshoppers, &c.—most insects were unclean, as were most creeping things, from vertebrate reptiles to molluscous snails. Not merely were the unclean animals to be rejected as articles of food, their carcasses were to be avoided, as the individual touching them would be unclean (Lev. xi. 1-47). Apart from the ceremonial law, the flesh of the prohibited animals was generally less wholesome than that of those allowed.

unclean-spirit, s.

New Test.: A demon, a wicked spirit, seizing on and acting through men (Matt. x. 1; Mark i. 27, iii. 30; v. 13, vi. 7; Luke iv. 36; Acts v. 16, viii. 7; Rev. xvi. 13). [POSSESSION, II. 3, POSSESSION-THEORY.]

Milton: P. L., v. 259.

ün-côn-form-a-bīl'-i-tý, s. [Pref. un- (1), and English conformability.] The quality or state of being unconformable.

"That the subterranean forces have visited different parts of the globe at successive periods is inferred chiefly from the unconformability of strata belonging to groups of different ages."—Lyell: Prin. of Geology, ch. xiii.

ün-côn-form'-a-ble, a. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. conformable.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Not conformable; not agreeable; not consistent.

"Unto those general rules, they know we do not defend that we may hold anything unconformable."—Hooker: Eccles. Politie, bk. ii., § 7.

2. Geol.: The term used when one series of beds is so placed over another that the superior beds re- pose more or less on the edges instead of on the planes of the inferior series. Thus on the borders of Wales and Shropshire the slaty beds of the Silurian system are curved or vertical, while those of the overlying carboniferous shale and limestone are horizontal. To produce unconformity, three series of events have generally occurred. First, the in- ferior beds, originally laid down horizontally, must at some subsequent time have been tilted up by a force, probably igneous, from beneath. Secondly, in most cases, the upturned ends of the strata must have been more or less acted on by denudation, which has rendered them a nearly horizontal plane on which fresh strata can easily rest. Thirdly, these fresh strata have been actually deposited. Approximately to measure the interval of time which these changes have occupied, intermediate beds must be sought for in other districts or regions, or failing these, note must be taken of the amount of alteration in life which has occurred during the unknown interval. This may be deter- mined by comparing the fossils in the lower with those in the upper beds. Unconformability is of value in fixing the date of ancient seismic or vol- canic action. If it tilted up the lower and had no influence on the upper strata, the irresistible infer- ence is that it occurred between the deposition of the two.

ün-côn-form'-a-blý, adv. [Eng. unconforma- b(le); -ly.] In an unconformable manner; not con- sistently or agreeably.

"In such cases the discordance of inclination between the superior and inferior strata is expressed by the term unconformity, and the upper rock is said to lie uncon- formably upon the lower."—Phillips: Geol. (ed. 1885), i. 78.

ün-côn-form'-ist, s. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. conformist.] A nonconformist, a dissenter.

"An assault of Unconformists on Church discipline."—Fuller: Church Hist., X. ii. 1.

ün-côn-form'-i-tý, s. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. conformity.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: Want of conformity; incongru- ity, inconsistency.

"To be upbraided with unconformity unto the pattern of our Lord and Savior's estate."—Hooker: Eccles. Poli- tie, bk. vii.

2. Geol.: Absence of conformity between strata the upper of which rest on the edges of the lower beds. (See extract under UNCONFORMABLY.)

ün-côn-fōund', v. t. [Pref. un- (1), and English confound.] Not to mix, mingle, involve, or con- fuse; to free from mixture.

"Where they could remain safe and unconfounded with the natives."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. iv., § 6.

¶ Philosophy of the Unconscious:

Philos.: A system introduced by E. v. Hartmann (born in Berlin, 1840), who published his Die Philosophie des Unbewussten in 1869. He assumes that there is in nature an unconscious Will and Idea (=the Substance of Spinoza, the Absolute Ego of Fichte, the Absolute Subject-object of Schelling, the Absolute Idea of Plato and Hegel, and the Will of Schopenhauer) as a pure and spiritual activity, without a substratum of nerve and brain, which is the basis of consciousness. The product of this Will and Idea is the world.

Mental Physiol.: The name given to the doctrine that the mind may undergo modifications, sometimes of very considerable importance, without being itself conscious of the process, until its results present themselves to the consciousness in the new ideas, or new combination of ideas, which the process has evolved. This doctrine has been current among German metaphysicians from the time of Leibnitz to the present day, and was systematically expounded by the late Sir William Hamilton. (Carpenter: Mental Physiol., ch. xiii.; see also Macmillan's Mag., Nov., 1870, p. 25.)

Uncovenanted Civil Service, s. A branch of the British Indian Civil Service, whose members (Europeans or natives) are subject to no entrance examination, nor entitled to promotion or retiring pension, and also may resign their office at pleasure.

uncovenanted-mercy, s.

Theol.: An expression used of something not promised by God in any covenant, and specially in the covenant of grace or of redemption. [COVENANT, ¶ (a).] For instance, to give Eternal Life to those who believe in Christ promised by God (John iii. 14, 15) is now regarded as part of a covenant on the part of God, with those who believe in Christ, to extend salvation to those who have not had opportunity of hearing of Christ, is held to be an uncovenanted mercy. It has been held by such churches as claim to be in the Apostolic Succession that the administration of the Covenant of Grace is entrusted solely to the successors of the Apostles, and that persons who do not receive the ordinances of religion from them, if saved at all, are saved by the uncovenanted mercies of God. (Generally in the plural.)

¶ Used also familiarly, in the sense of, more than one expects or deserves.

"Let us leave him [the Duke of Argyle] to the uncovenanted mercies of Prof. Huxley."—London Daily News.

Hydraul.: A water-wheel moved by water passing beneath; in contradistinction to the overshot, in which it is received above; the breast-wheel, in which it is received at or nearly on a level with its axis, the turbine, in which it runs through; and some others. Poncelet's water-wheel has buckets of a curvilinear form, open at the back, without a sole-plate, to secure ventilation. The water impinges upon each bucket at nearly the lowest point of the wheel, the shuttle being arranged to draw upward; and as the water enters it follows the curve of the bucket, rises and falls over into the next in succession. In this way the force of the water is expended directly upon the wheel, instead of a portion of it being wasted in its passage along the sluice.

ün-dēr-shrüb, s. [Prefix under-, and English shrub.]

Bot.: A plant of shrubby habit, but scarcely attaining the dimensions of a shrub. A woody plant of small size intermediate between a shrub and an herb. It differs from the former in this respect that the ends of its branches perish every year, and from the latter by having branches of a woody texture, which in some cases exist more than a year. Example: The Tree Mignonette of gardens. A plant resembling an undershrub is described as Suffruticose (q. v.).

II. Philos.: A term used in different significations by different writers. By some it is made synonymous with reason [REASON, s., II. 3], others confine it to the judgment. (See extracts.)

"The understanding is the medial faculty, or faculty of means, as reason, on the other hand, is the source of ideas or ultimate ends. By reason we determine the ultimate end; by the understanding we are enabled to select and adopt the appropriate means for the attainment of, or approximation to, this end, according to circumstances. But an ultimate end must of necessity be an idea, that is, that which is not representable by the senses, and has no correspondent in nature, or the world of the senses."—Coleridge: Notes on English Div., ii. 338.

"I use the term understanding, not for the noetic faculty, intellect proper, or place of principles, but for the dianoetic, or discursive faculty in its widest signification, for the faculty of relations or comparisons; and thus in the meaning in which Verstand is now employed by the Germans."—Hamilton: Discussions, p. 4. 3. Done or given in excess; excessive, inordinate; as, an undue attachment to forms; undue rigor in carrying out the law, &c.

Law: A phrase used specially in connection with voting or the making of a will. In the first case it consists of bribery or any force, violence, restraint, threat to inflict injury or intimidation, designed to coerce a person into voting for a particular candidate, or abstaining from voting at all, or as an infliction because of his having done so. The perpetrator exposes himself to a legal penalty. In case of a contested election the principal may be declared, by the court, not elected. In the case of a will, undue influence is exerted when one acquires such an ascendancy over the testator's mind as to prevent the latter from being a free agent. If he spontaneously bequeath money to one whom he esteems or loves, the esteem or affection do not constitute undue influence. Importunity does. When undue influence is proved the will becomes void.

ŭn-dŭe'-nĕss, s. [English undue; -ness.] The quality or state of being undue.

ŭn-dŭke', v. t. [Pref. un- (2), and Eng. duke.] To deprive of dukedom; to degrade from the rank of a duke. (Special coinage.)

"The king hath unduked twelve dukes."—Pepys: Diary, Dec. 12, 1663.

ŭn'-dŭ-lānt, a. [Low Lat. undulans, pr. par. of undulo=to rise and fall like a wave; undula=a little wave, dimin. from Lat. unda=a wave.] Undulatory.

"Gliding and lapsing in an undulant dance."
Sir H. Taylor: St. Clement's Eve, ii. 2.

ŭn'-dŭ-lā-rŭy, a. [Low Lat. undula=a little wave.] Playing like waves; wavy; coming with regular intermissions.

"The blasts and undulatory breaths thereof maintain no certainty in their course."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vii., ch. xvii.

ŭn'-dŭ-lāte, a. [Lat. undulatus, from undula, dimin. from unda=a wave.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: Wavy; having a waved surface. (Philips.)

2. Bot.: [UNDULATED.]

ŭn'-dŭ-lāte, v. i. & t. [UNDULATE, a.]

A. Intrans.: To have a wavy motion; to rise and fall in waves; hence, to move in arching, curving, or bending lines; to wave.

"Their undulating manes."
Couper: Homer's Iliad, xxiii.

B. Trans.: To cause to wave or move with a wavy motion; to cause to vibrate.

"Breath vocalized—i. e., vibrated and undulated, may in a different manner affect the lips, or tongue."—Holder: Elements of Speech.

ŭn'-dŭ-lāt-ĕd, pa. par. & a. [UNDULATE, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Wavy; having a waved surface.

2. Bot.: Wavy; having an uneven, alternately convex and concave margin, as the leaf of the holly.

ŭn'-dŭ-lāt-ĭng, pr. par. & a. [UNDULATE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Waving; rising and falling like waves; vibrating. (Thomson: Summer, 982.)

2. Having a form or outline resembling that of waves; wavy; having an arched, curved, or bending outline. (A stretch of country is said to be undulating when it presents a succession of elevations and depressions resembling the waves of the sea.) In bot. the same as UNDULATED, B. 2 (q. v.).

ŭn'-dŭ-lāt-ĭng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. undulating; -ly.] In an undulating manner; in the manner of waves.

ŭn-dŭ-lā-tion, s. [UNDULATE, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of undulating; a waving or wavy motion; fluctuation; as, the rising and falling of water when disturbed by oars or wind.

2. A wavy form; a form resembling that of a wave or waves.

"The root of the wilder sort [is] incomparable for its crisped undulations."—Evelyn: Sylva, bk. ii., chap. iv., § 15.

II. Technically:

1. Pathol.: The movement, as ascertained by pressure or percussion, of a fluid in any natural or artificial cavity of the body. Called also Fluctuation. Used specif. in sense 3. (q. v.)

2. Phys.: A motion to and fro, up and down, or from side to side, but without translation of the particles composing any fluid medium. Called also a Vibration or a Wave-motion. [UNDULATORY-THEORY.]

3. Surg.: A certain motion of the matter of an abscess when pressed, which indicates its fitness for opening.

¶ 1. Length of an undulation:

Acoustics: The distance which sound travels during a complete vibration of the body by which it is produced.

2. Point of undulation: [SINGULAR-POINT.]

ŭn-dŭ-lā-tion-ĭst, s. [Eng. undulation; -ist.] One who supports the undulatory theory of light.

ŭn'-dŭ-lāt-ive, adj. [English undulat(e); -ive.] Undulating, undulatory.

ŭn-dŭ-lā-tō-, prep. [UNDULATE.] Undulated, undulating, waved on the margin.

Bot.: Rugose or rugged, waved. (Loudon.)

Bot.: Having elevated lines wavy in direction.

ŭn'-dŭ-lā-tōr-ŷ, adj. [Eng. undulat(e); -ory.] Having an undulating character; moving in the manner of a series of waves; rising and falling like waves; pertaining to such a motion.

"The undulatory motion propagated along the body."—Paley: Nat. Theol., ch. xvi.

undulatory-theory, s.

Optics: The generally accepted theory which traces light to vibrations set up and transmitted as waves in an invisible medium termed the luminiferous ether. This, it is assumed, is (sensibly) imponderable, and almost infinitely elastic, and fills all space, passing freely through the pores or between the atoms of bodies as the wind does through the trees, but having its motions, in a somewhat analogous manner, hindered or modified thereby, and thus accounting for the retardation which is the principal factor in producing Refraction (q. v.) Luminous bodies are believed to be (and in the case of heated luminous bodies are known to be) in a state of intense molecular vibration, and these successive impulses communicated to the ether give rise to successive waves of radiant energy, whose effects on other bodies depend upon their rate, as the pitch of a sound does. The slower periods apparently cause heating effects only; more rapid impulses produce luminous and chemical effects as well, and energetic chemical action is exerted by waves far too rapid to produce luminous impressions. Within the luminous range each rate produces on the normal retina the sensation of one given color only, while a proportion of all periods mixed produces that of white. In the phenomena of Reflection, Refraction, Dispersion, and ordinary Interference, there is nothing to define the direction of the actual ethereal vibrations; but the facts of Polarization (q. v.) demonstrate that these must be at right angles to the path of the ray, which again implies that the ether, rare and subtle as it is, must have the chief distinguishing quality of a solid, or resemble a thin but solid jelly rather than a fluid. This is believed to be the case, and the ether is also believed to be the medium through which electricity and other forms of energy are transmitted. The Undulatory Theory is usually ascribed to Huyghens, but was firmly established by the convincing experiments and reasoning of Young and Fresnel. Newton adopted the Corpuscular Theory, but in the second edition of his Opticks he added "queries," showing that later he was very strongly disposed to adopt the other.

ŭn-dŭll', v. t. [Pref. un- (2), and Eng. dull.] To remove dullness or obscurity from; to clear, to purify.

"Poetry . . . is a most musical modulator of all intelligibles by her inventive variations; undulling their grossness."—Whitlock: Present Manners of the English, p. 477.

ŭn'-dŭ-loŭs, a. [UNDULATE.] Undulating.

"The undulous readiness of her volatile paces."—Blackmore: Lorna Doone, ch. lxxv.

ŭn-dŭ-lŷ, adv. [Eng. undul(e); -ly.] In an undue manner or degree; wrongly, improperly, excessively, inordinately.

"Subject to the delusions of the mind when unduly agitated either by sensation or reflection."—Warburton: Sermons, vol. x., ser. 27.

ŭn-dŭmp'-ish, v. t. [Pref. -un (2), and English dumpish.] To free from the dumps; to remove heaviness, dullness, or sullenness from.

"He [the jester] could undumpish her at his pleasure."—Fuller: Worthies; Staffordshire.

ŭn-dŭr'-a-ble, adj. [Pref. -un (1), and English durable.] Not of a durable character; not lasting (Arnway: Tablet of Moderation, p. 109.)

ŭn-dŭr'-a-blŷ, adv. [Eng. undurab(le); -ly.] In an undurable manner; not lastingly.

ŭn-dŭst', v. t. [Pref. un- (2), and English dust.] To free from dust; to clear.

"We frequently dress up the altar of our hearts, and undust it from all these little foulnesses."—Montague: Devoute Essays, pt. ii., treat. 6.

ŭn-dŭ-tĕ-oŭs, adj. [Pref. un- (1), and English duteous.] Not duteous; not performing one's duties to parents and superiors; undutiful.

"And this deceit loses the name of craft,
Of disobedience, or unduteous title."
Shakesp.: Merry Wives, v. 5.

ŭn-dŭ-tĭ-fŭl, ŭn-dŭ-tĭ-fŭll, a. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. dutiful.]

1. Not dutiful; not performing one's duty; neglectful of one's duty.

"Never give him cause to think them unkind or undutiful."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

2. Characterized by disobedience to or neglect of one's duty; disobedient.

"The church was indeed very severe against such undutiful proceedings."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. iii., ch. v.

ŭn-dŭ-tĭ-fŭl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. undutiful; -ly.] In an undutiful manner; with neglect of duty.

"Charged them with undutifully and ungratefully encroaching on the rights of the mother country."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

ŭn-dŭ-tĭ-fŭl-nĕss, s. [Eng. undutiful; -ness.] The quality or state of being undutiful; disobedience.

"Undutifulness to an almighty superior, and ingratitude to a gracious benefactor, such as God is."—Secker: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 18.

ŭn-dwĕl'-lā-ble, a. [Pref. un- (1), and English dwelable.] Uninhabitable; not capable of being dwelt in.

"Lest par aventure I sette thee desert, a lond undwellable."—Wycliffe: Jer. vi. 8.

ŭn-dwĕlt', a. [Prefix un- (1), and Eng. dwelt.] Not dwelt in; not inhabited. (Followed by in.)

"It, like a house undwelt in, would decay."
Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, i. 1.

ŭn-dŷ'-ĭng, a. [Prefix un- (1), and Eng. dying.]

1. Not dying; not perishing; immortal, indestructible.

"To chains of darkness and the undying worm."
Milton: P. L., vi. 739.

2. Unceasing; never ending or perishing; imperishable.

"But thou, a schoolboy, to the sea hadst carried Undying recollections."
Wordsworth: On the Naming of Places, No. vi.

undying-flowers, s. pl. [EVERLASTING-FLOWERS.] (Paxton.)

ŭn-ĕared', a. [Prefix un- (1), and Eng. eared.] Not eared or plowed; unplowed, untilled. (Lit. & fig.) (Shakesp.: Sonnet 3.)

ŭn-ĕarnĕd', a. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. earned.] Not earned; not gained or merited by labor or services.

"The hour of supper comes unearn'd."
Milton: P. L., ix. 225.

unearned-increment, s.

Polit. Econ.: The increase in the value of land produced without labor or expenditure on the part of the owner; as, for instance, by the growth of a town in its vicinity. J. S. Mill and his followers contend that this increment should belong to the nation.

ŭn-ĕar'-nĕst, a. [Pref. un- (1), and English earnest.] Not earnest.

"Be possessed of vs after an unearnest sorte."—Udall: Luke xii.

ŭn-ĕarth', v. t. [Pref. un- (2), and Eng. earth.]

I. Literally:

1. To pull or drag out of the earth.

"To unearth the root of an old tree."
Wordsworth: Simon Lee.

2. To drive from an earth or burrow, as a fox, badger, &c.; to cause to leave a burrow.

"It was made known that, when that time had expired, the vermin who had been the curse of London would be unearthed and hunted without mercy."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxii.

II. Fig.: To bring to light; to reveal, to discover, to find out.

"Those who have busied themselves in unearthing the early history of curling, have been unable to discover that James IV. really played much at the game."—Field, Nov. 26, 1887.

ŭn-ĕarth'-lŷ, a. [Prefix un- (1), and English earthly.] Not earthly; not of this world; hence, supernatural, not like, or as if not proceeding from or belonging to, this world.

"To maintain able-bodied men in unemployed imprisonment."—Froude: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

¶ The Unemployed: A collective term, embracing all persons in humble circumstances who are out of employment. These may be divided into three classes: (1) Those who are unable to work, either through age, accident, or disease; (2) those who are willing to work but cannot find employment; and (3) those who will not work under any circumstances. The problem presented by the two classes first mentioned is a very grave one; and the gravity of its solution increases yearly and in direct ratio with the increase of population in the great urban centers. Several times have the foundations of various governments been shaken by the demand of the unemployed for bread, and more than once, especially in France, has revolution reared its head close on the track of want and distress arising from monopolization of wealth by a few and other complications of the social situation, such complications resulting in depression or stagnation of business and enforced idleness of thousands. Many remedies have been proposed for the alleviation of the distress of the unemployed, but all of them seem to fall far short of their intended effect. In this country we have seen for a decade or more a determined struggle between capital and labor, and with every outbreak the number of those who may be considered permanently among the unemployed is largely increased. One of the most remarkable demonstrations of the unemployed in this country was the simultaneous organization and movement toward the national capital of several so-called "industrial armies." These "armies," while they undoubtedly contained a small proportion of honest working men, were largely made up of the class described under 3 in the above enumeration. Only one detachment reached Washington, where its leader, "Gen." Coxey, was arrested and imprisoned and his followers scattered. All over the country other bands collected, and for a few months the entire nation rung with their lawless deeds. The movement finally died of inanition.

"The unemployed are formed from many different classes, from many diverse elements; and we get no nearer to understanding their condition, to say nothing of improving it, if we persist in treating them as though they were all of a single type, and that type one which is in no degree representative."—St. James's Gazette, Dec. 22, 1887.

ün'-gu-lā'-ta, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. ungulatus=having claws or hoofs, from unguis (q. v.).]

1. Zoölogy:

(1) A provisional group of Mammals, the living members of which correspond to the Pecora and Belluæ of Linnaeus, and the Ruminantia and Pachydermata of Cuvier.

The dentition is heterodont and diphyodont, the milk-teeth not being completely changed till the animal attains its full development; the molars have broad crowns with tuberculated or ridged surfaces; clavicals absent; toes with broad, blunt nails, or, in most cases, with hoofs, more or less inclosing the ungual phalanges; scaphoid and lunar bones of carpus distinct. The group is usually divided into two minor groups: Ungulata vera, often called simply Ungulata [(2)], and Subungulata (q. v.). All the species are eminently adapted for a terrestrial life, and, generally speaking, for a vegetable diet. Some are, to a greater or less extent, omnivorous, as Sus; but no genus is distinctly predaceous.

(2) True Ungulates; a group of Mammals classed as an order, or as a group of the wider Ungulata [(1)]. Feet never plantigrade, functional toes never more than four, the first digit being suppressed; allantois largely developed; placenta non-deciduate; uterus bicornuate; mammae usually few and inguinal (as in Equus), or many and abdominal (as in Sus), but never solely pectoral. There are two divisions: Antiodactyla and Perissodactyla (q. v.), first indicated by Cuvier and established by Owen, who proposed the names now in general use.

2. Palæont.: The Ungulata appear first in the Eocene Tertiary, in which period the Artiodactyla and Perissodactyla were already differentiated. [TELEODACTYLA.]

ū-nī-corn, *u-ni-corne, s. [Fr. unicorne, from Lat. unicornum, accus. of unicornus=one-horned, from unus=one, and cornu=a horn.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. An animal having a single horn, frequently mentioned by Greek and Latin authors. Ctesias calls it the Wild Ass, and Aristotle the Indian Ass. Ctesias describes the Wild Ass as being about the size of a horse, with a white body, red head, and blue eyes, having a horn on the forehead a cubit long, which for the extent of two palms from the forehead is entirely white, black in the middle, and pointed and red at the extremity. Of the horn drinking cups were formed, and those who used them were said not to be subject to spasm, epilepsy, or the effects of poison. Unicorns were said to be very swift and strong, not naturally fierce, but when provoked they fought desperately with horn, heels, and teeth, so that it was impossible to take them alive. Browne (Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. xxiii.) enumerates five kinds of unicorns: "The Indian ox, the Indian ass, the rhinoceros, the oryx, and that which was more eminently termed monoceros or unicornis;" and in the same chapter he quotes descriptions of this mythical animal from various authors. Wilkin, in a note to Browne (loc. sup. cit.) gives a statement from Rüppell that the unicorn exists in Kordofan, where it is known by the name of millekma. He describes it as of a reddish color, of the size of a small horse, of the slender make of a gazelle, and furnished with a long, straight, slender horn in the male, which is wanting in the female. Some added that it had divided hoofs, while others declared it to be single-hoofed. Three Arabs told Rüppell that they had seen the animal in question. All these stories have probably some foundation in fact, to which a large superstructure of fiction has been added. An antelope like an oryx, seen in profile would appear to a careless observer like an animal with a single horn; and hence the mythical tales of unicorns probably arose. (See illustration.)

Oryx grazing (Profile).
A. Head of Oryx.

*2. A kind of insect having a horn upon its head. "Some unicorns we will allow even among insects, as those nasicornous beetles described by Muffetus."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. xxiii.

3. A carriage and pair with a third horse in front; also applied to such an equipage.

"Let me drive you out some day in my unicorn."—Miss Edgeworth: Belinda, ch. xvii.

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: [MONOCEROS, 1.]

2. Her.: A fabulous animal, having the head, neck, and body of a horse, with a beard like that of a goat, the legs of a buck, the tale of a lion, and a long tapering horn, spirally twisted, in the middle of the forehead. Two unicorns were borne as supporters of the Scottish royal arms for about a century before the union of the Crowns in 1603; and the sinister supporter of the arms of the United Kingdom is a unicorn argent, armed, crined, and unguled or, gorged with a coronet of crosses patée and fleurs de lis, with a chain affixed passing between the fore legs and reflected over the back of the last. (See illustration under REVERTED.)

4. Continued or unvarying sameness or likeness; monotony.

¶ Act of Uniformity:

English Church History: The Act 13 & 14 Car. II., c. 4, designed to regulate the terms of membership in the Church of England and in the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge. Both the Anglican and the Puritan parties had desired their faith to be that of the Church of England, and Charles II., who, as a step to obtaining his father's throne, wished to stand well with both parties, promised at Breda to use his influence to bring about a certain measure of comprehension. But the Parliament was in no mood to vote for such a scheme, and the Act of Uniformity required the clergy to sign the Thirty-nine Articles and to use the Book of Common Prayer. The enforcement of these regulations led to the secession from the Church of England of upward of 2,000 clergymen, and laid the foundation of modern dissent. The Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, passed July 18, 1872, somewhat modified that of Charles, as the University Test Act, passed June, 1871, had done the year before.

2. Bot. (of a plant): Of one sex only; having stamens and pistils in different flowers; diclinous. Used of a monœcious or of a diœcious plant or its flowers.

ū-nī-sīl'-ī-cate, subst. [Pref. uni-, and English silicate.]

Min.: The second subdivision of the Anhydrous Silicates, which Dana divides as follows: (1) Bisilicates; oxygen ratio for bases and silica, 1:2; (2) Unisilicates; in which the ratio for the bases and silica is as 1:1; (3) Sub-silicates; oxygen ratio for bases and silica, 1:3; sometimes 1:2 and 1:3.

ū-nī-sōn, ū-nī-sonne, s. & a. [Fr. unisson, from Lat. unisonum, accus. of unisonus=having the same sound as something else; unus=one, and sonus=a sound; Sp. unison; Ital. unisono.]

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

*1. Lit.: A single, unvaried tone.

"While the long solemn unison went round."

Pope Dunciad, iv. 612.

2. Fig.: Accordance, agreement, harmony.

"It is the more tranquil style which is most frequently in unison with our minds."—Knox: Essay 28.

II. Music:

1. The state of sounding at the same pitch; accordance or coincidence of sounds proceeding from an equality in the number of vibrations made in a given time by a sonorous body.

2. Music in octaves for mixed instruments or voices.

B. As adjective:

*I. Ordinary Language:

1. Sounding alone; unisonous.

"Tempered soft tunings, intermixt with voice Choral or unison." Milton P. L., vii. 599.

2. In accord.

"Something of peculiar harmony, or rather a kind of unison correspondence between them."—South: Sermons, vol. vi., ser. 1.

II. Music: Sounded together; coinciding in pitch or sound; unisonal; as, unison passages.

ū-nīs'-ōn-āl, a. [Eng. unison; -al.] Being in unison.

"The frequent use of unisonal passages for the voices."—London Standard.

ū-nīs'-ōn-āl-lī, adv. [Eng. unisonal; -ly.] In unison.

"Tenors and basses burst in unisonally."—Church Times, March 4, 1887.

ū-nīs'-ō-nançe, s. [Eng. unisonan(t); -ce.] The quality or state of being in unison; accordance of sounds; unison.

ū-nīs'-ō-nant, a. [Lat. unus=one, and sonans, pr. par. of sono=to sound.] Being in unison; having the same degree of gravity or acuteness.

ū-nīs'-ō-noūs, a. [UNISON.]

1. Sounding alone; without harmony.

"These apt notes (to sing the Psalms withal) were about 40 tunes of one part only, and in one unisonous key."—Warton: Hist. Eng. Poetry, i. 171.

2. Being in unison; having the same sound or pitch.

ū-nīt, ū-nite, s. [An abbrev. of unity (q. v.).]

I. Ord. Lang.: A single person or thing regarded as having oneness for its main attribute; a single one of a number, forming the basis of count or calculation.

II. Technically:

1. Arith.: The least whole number or one, represented by the figure 1. Numbers are collections of things of the same kind, each of which is a unit of the collection. Thus 20 feet is a collection of 20 equal spaces, each of which is equal to 1 foot; here 1 foot is the unit or base of the collection.

2. Math. & Physics: Any known determinate quantity by the constant repetition of which any other quantity of the same kind is measured. It may be a length, a surface, a solid, a weight, a time, as the case may be.

¶ 1. Abstract unit: The unit of numeration; the abstract unit 1 is the measure of the relation of equality of two numbers. It is the base of the system of natural numbers, and incidentally the base of all quantities.

2. Decimal and duodecimal units: Those in scales of numbers increasing or decreasing by ten or twelve respectively.

3. Dynamic units:

(1) Unit of force: A dyne; a force which, acting for one second on a mass of one gramme, gives to it a velocity of one centimeter per second.

(2) Unit of work done: A watt (q. v.); the power developed when 44.25 foot pounds are done per minute=one 746th part of a horse-power. [FOOT-POUND, KILOGRAMMETER.]

4. Electric units:

(1) Unit of quantity: A coulomb. The quantity of electricity that will liberate .000162 grains of hydrogen from water, or .005232 grains of zinc from a solution of the metal. In this unit, rate or time is taken no account of.

(2) Unit of current: An ampere; a current flowing at the rate of one coulomb per second, or liberating .000162 grains of hydrogen, &c., per second.

(3) Unit of electro-motive force: A volt (q. v.). The force or difference of potential required to produce, through a wire of one ohm resistance, a current of one ampere.

(4) Unit of resistance: The legal unit of resistance, as settled by the International Electrical Congress, at Paris, 1884, is that of a column of pure mercury 106 centimeters long, 1 square millimeter in sectional area at 0° C. The name ohm is now confined to this unit, but was formerly used to denote an older unit chosen by the British Association, which is to the legal ohm as 1.0112 to 1.

(5) Unit of capacity: A farad (q. v.). A condenser has a capacity of one farad when a potential difference of one volt between its two sets of plates charges each of them with one coulomb.

(6) Absolute units: The absolute electro-motive force unit is a force, and the absolute unit magnetic pole is a pole, which, when placed at a distance of one centimeter, from a similar force or pole, repels it with a force of one dyne. These units are inconveniently small for actual use, thus one volt=10⁸ absolute units.

(7) Unit of work done: The watt (q. v.); the rate at which electrical work is done is measured by watts. A watt is the power developed in the circuit, when one ampere of current produces one volt difference of potential at the terminals. Hence this electrical result=one 746th part of one horse-power. [¶ 3 (2).]

5. Fractional unit: The unit of a fraction. Thus in the fraction $\frac{3}{4}$ there is an assemblage of three units, each of which is one-fourth of the whole number.

6. Integral unit: The unit 1; the unit of integral numbers.

7. Specific-gravity unit: For solids or liquids, one cubic foot of distilled water at 62° F.=1; of air and gases, one cubic foot of atmospheric air at 62°.

8. Unit of heat: [THERMAL-UNIT.]

9. Unit of illumination: The light of a sperm candle burning 120 grains per hour. The standard for gas is that the flame, burning at the rate of five cubic feet per hour, shall give a light equal to the light of 14 sperm candles, each consuming at the rate of 120 grains per hour.

10. Unit of measure: The unit of measure of any quantity is a quantity of the same kind, with which the quantity is compared.

11. Unit of value: In England, a pound sterling, represented by a gold coin called a sovereign (q. v.). In the United States, a gold dollar, weighing 25.8 grains, one-tenth of which is alloy.

Elect.: An instrument devised by Sir W. Snow Harris for measuring definite quantities of electricity.

ū-nīt'-ā-ble, ū-nīte'-ā-ble, a. [Eng. unit(e); -able.] Capable of being united or joined together by growth or otherwise.

Ū-nī-tār'-ī-an, s. & a. [Eccles. Lat. unitarius; Ger. unitarier; Fr. unitaire; Ital. unitario; Sp. unitario; Wel. undodwr, undodiad.]

1. Theology and Church History:

(1) A name adopted by those professing Christians who, conceiving of the Godhead as unipersonal, regard the Father as the only true God. The term first appears (unitaria religio) in a decree of the Transylvanian Diet, Oct. 25, 1600. It superseded the terms Arian and Antitrinitarian, employed in earlier decrees, and was adopted by the Transylvanian Unitarians, as the designation of their Church, in 1638. This body, now the Hungarian Unitarian Church, has had religious liberty since 1569, and has been presided over by a succession of bishops, from Francis David (died 1579) to Joseph Ferencz, the present bishop, who has a seat in the Upper Chamber of the Hungarian Diet. This Church has some 60,000 members, and supports three colleges; the largest is at Kolozsvár (Klausenburg). Its standard of doctrine, interpreted with freedom, is the Summa Universæ Theologiæ Christianæ secundum Unitarios (1787). Many writers have confused the Unitarii with the Uniti, a name given to those Lutherans and Calvinists of Hungary who came to a temporary agreement in 1558 on the doctrine of the sacraments. The Minor or Antitrinitarian Church of Poland, from its beginning (1565) to its suppression (1660), studiously avoided the Unitarian name. Its theology was originally Arian and Anabaptist; but after it had yielded to the personal influence of Faustus Socinus, its (unofficial) standard of doctrine was a manual usually styled the Racovian Catechism (1605). At Amsterdam, by the issue (begun 1665) of the Library of the Polish Brethren, the Unitarian name was introduced to Western Europe. In England it was first used by Thomas Firmin, a philanthropic mercer, under whose auspices appeared A Brief History of the Unitarians, called also Socinians (1687). Firmin (died 1697), a Sabellian, meditated the formation of Unitarian societies, the members of which were to be in communion with the Church of England. In 1706, Thomas Emlyn, a Presbyterian divine of Arian views, fined and imprisoned at Dublin for denying the Deity of Christ, published A Vindication of the Worship of the Lord Jesus Christ on Unitarian Principles. He preached for a few years to a small congregation in London at Cutlers' Hall. At his death (1741) he had outlived his movement. In 1774 Theophilus Lindsey, who had resigned (1773) the living of Catterick, Yorkshire, opened a chapel in Essex Street, Strand, revising the Prayer-book to suit the exclusive worship of the Father. This was the signal for the severance of the Unitarians from other Nonconformists as a distinct religious body. Influential congregations of English Presbyterians, and the small body of Old General Baptists, had become permeated with Arian views, and were largely prepared for a further step. The ablest theologian of the party was Joseph Priestley, the distinguished chemist, originally an Independent. In 1791 Lindsey and Priestley founded a Unitarian Society, the basis of which, designed to exclude Arianism, was formulated by Thomas Belsham. In 1825 the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was organized on a wider basis. The Welsh Unitarians have a similar history to those of England. The few congregations in Scotland, except Edinburgh, are results of mission work in the present century. In Ireland the Unitarians have retained Presbyterian government. Refusal to subscribe the Westminster Confession excluded the Antrim Presbytery from the General Synod in 1726. In 1826 a member of that presbytery, William Bruce, D. D., avowed himself a Unitarian in print. In 1830 a further secession from the main body of Presbyterians, headed

by Henry Montgomery, LL. D., formed the Remonstrant Synod. These and some other bodies, numbering forty congregations, are united in the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterians (1835). In the United States the Unitarians sprang from the Congregational body. King's Chapel in Boston, the oldest Episcopal church in New England, adopted a prayer-book on Lindsey's plan in 1735, and became Congregational in 1787. Its then minister, James Freeman, D. D., was the first avowed Unitarian preacher in America. Channing came out as a Unitarian in 1815. His Baltimore sermon (1819) marks the cleavage between the Unitarian and orthodox sections of the Congregational body. In Boston the Unitarians are a power, and they show great vitality in other parts of the States. They have divinity schools at Cambridge, in connection with Harvard University, and at Meadville, Pennsylvania. Some important bodies approximate to them in their views of the Godhead. The Universalists are the nearest of these; the Christians, a Baptist body, the Christian Disciples, and the Hicksite section of the Quakers, are all more or less Unitarian in theology. [UNITARIANISM.]

(2) A general term for all non-Trinitarian Christians, whether they have themselves used the name or not. Some of the ante-Nicene Fathers, the Sabellians, Arius and his followers, the Photinians, &c., have been included in this designation. At the Reformation period Servetus and others, and subsequently Faustus Socinus and his school, are thus described by later writers. In England, Bartholomew Legate, the last person burned at Smithfield (1612); John Bidle, who gathered a London congregation during the Commonwealth; Samuel Clarke, D. D., whose Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity (1712) had a powerful influence, have all been reckoned Unitarians; and the name has been applied to writers like Milton, Locke, and Newton.

(3) Any non-Christian monotheist. The Jews are sometimes called Unitarians; and Wesley uses the expression "Unitarian fiend" in his Hymn for the Mahometans.

2. Philos. (pl.): A name for a special class of Realists.

"The Realists or Substantialists are again divided into Dualists, and into Unitarians or Mouists, according as they are, or are not, contented with the testimony of consciousness to the ultimate duplicity of subject and object in perception."—Hamilton: Metaphysics, i. 295.

B. As adjective:

1. Theol., Church Hist., &c.: Pertaining to or connected with Unitarians, in the several senses defined above.

2. Philos.: Holding the unity of subject and object in perception.

3. Polit.: Favoring a plan of union. In continental politics first used of the party in favor of a united Italy; then applied in the case of Germany, the Slavs, &c.

Ū-nī-tār'-ī-an-īsm, s. [Eccles. Lat. & Ger. unitarismus; Fr. unitarisme; Ital. unitarismo, unitarismo, unitarianesimo; Wel. undodiaeth.]

Theology and Church History:

1. A collective name for the views of Unitarians. Unitarians have no formulated test of membership, and have always shown great varieties of opinion. The Arian school has little influence, except in Ireland. The Socinian theology, with its worship of Christ, has never been completely adopted in Great Britain or America. Priestley's Unitarianism included a determinist philosophy and a strong element of supernaturalism. The return to a spiritual philosophy was initiated by Channing. Many of his followers, influenced by Emerson and Parker, have done their best to relieve Christianity of its supernatural ingredients. All own a spiritual allegiance to Christ, though varying as to the nature and extent of his authority. Appealing to Scripture as a witness for their views, Unitarians have generally limited revelation to the communication of spiritual data. They reject a substitutionary atonement, and are usually advocates of a universal restoration.

2. The Unitarian cause. Unitarianism as an organized interest has never taken large proportions, and it is not easy to estimate its actual strength. It has produced a number of influential men, far in excess of its denominational importance; and the stress which it lays on individuality, while checking its progress, has added to its power. By the Toleration Act (1689) the open preaching of Unitarianism was forbidden in Great Britain and Ireland, a legal disability not removed till 1813 (in Ireland, 1817).

Ū-nī-tār'-ī-an-ize, v. t. & i. [Eng. Unitarian; -ize.] To cause to conform to Unitarianism.

ū-nīt-a-rĭ, a. [Eng. unit; -ary.] Pertaining or relating to a unit.

unitary-theory, s.

Chem.: A term applied by Gerhardt to the system of chemistry in which the molecules of all bodies are compared, as to their magnitude, with one unit molecule—water for example—and all chemical reactions are, as far as possible, reduced to one typical form of reaction—namely, double decomposition.

u-nīte', u-nyte, v. t. & i. [Lat. unitus, pa. par. of unio=to unite, from unus=one.]

A. Transitive:

1. To combine or conjoin, so as to form into one; to make to be one, and no longer separate; to incorporate into one.

"Unite
Your troops."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., iv. 7.

"Hymen did our hands Unite commutual." Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 2.

3. To cause to adhere; to connect or join together; to attach.

"The peritonæum, which is a dry body, may be united with the muscularous flesh."—Wiseman: Surgery.

4. To make to agree; to bring into a state of agreement or uniformity; to render uniform.

"The king proposed nothing more than to unite his kingdom in one form of worship."—Clarendon.

B. Intransitive:

1. To become one; to become incorporated; to grow together; to become attached, conjoined, or consolidated; to combine, to coalesce.

2. To join in an act; to combine, to concur; to act in union.

u-nīt'-ēd, pa. par. or adj. [UNITE, v.] Joined together, combined, made one; allied, conjoint, harmonious; in union.

"The men who followed his banner were supposed to be not less numerous than all the Macdonalds and Macleans united."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

¶ The word "United" forms part of the names of various sects appearing in the Registrar-General's Return, as, the United Christian Army, the United Christian Church, the United Evangelical Church of Germany, the United Free Methodist Church.

United Brethren, s. pl. [MORAVIANS.]

United Christian Party, s. A political party in the U. S., which held its first national convention at Rock Island, Ill., May 1, 1900. It adopted a resolution declaring the purpose of the organization to be the application of the "Christ principle in State and Nation." J. F. R. Leonard, of Iowa, and D. L. Martin, of Pa., its first nominees for President and Vice-President, received 1,059 votes, Nov. 6, 1900.

United Greeks, s. pl.

Church Hist.: A comprehensive name including all those who follow the Greek rite, and at the same time acknowledge the authority of the Pope. These are (1) the Melchites (q. v.) in the East, (2) the Ruthenians (q. v.), (3) the Greek Catholics of Italy, whose clergy are allowed to marry when in minor orders, and continue in the married state after they are priests, but are forbidden, under pain of deposition, to contract a second marriage. These Greeks, about 30,000 in number, have three seminaries, each with a resident Greek bishop to ordain the priests, but otherwise they are subject to the bishop in whose diocese they live. (4) The Catholics of the Greco-Roumaic rite in Hungary and Siebenbürgen, whose number about 900,000, and form an ecclesiastical province. Their secular clergy are married.

United Irishmen, s. pl.

Hist.: A secret society formed in 1791 by Theobald Wolfe Tone, having for its object the establishment of a republic in Ireland. Being arrested, and sentenced to death by a military commission, he committed suicide (Nov., 1798).

United Kingdom, s.

Geog. & Hist.: The name adopted on Jan. 1, 1801, when Great Britain and Ireland were united.

United Presbyterian Church, s.

Eccles. & Church Hist.: The third in point of magnitude and importance among the Presbyterian denominations in Scotland, the two in advance of it in point of numbers being the Established and the Free Churches. It was formed by the union between the Secession and the Relief bodies on May 13, 1847. Its tenets are essentially those of the Confession of Faith, with modifications needful to adapt it to the views of its ministers as to the relation of the civil magistrate to the church and religious toleration. Nearly all its office-bearers are opposed to the principle of establishments, but latitude of belief on the subject is permitted, and a minority hold the opposite view. In May, 1876, the United Presbyterian Church made a friendly disavowal of its eongregational south of the Tweed that these might unite with the English Presbyterian Church to constitute the Presbyterian Church of England. [PRESBYTERIAN, B.] At the end of 1886 the United Presbyterian Church consisted of 32 presbyteries, 546 congregations, and 82,063 communicants, and had a revenue of £317,955 17s. 11d. It has foreign missions in the West Indies, in South Africa, &c., in India, China, and Japan.

United Provinces, s.

Geog. & Hist.: The provinces of Guelderland, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, and Friesland, which united in 1579, and became the nucleus of the Dutch Republic.

United States, s. pl. The forty-five states of North America, composing the Federal Republic, together with four organized territories, the Indian Territory, and the District of Columbia. It extends from the Atlantic Ocean on the east to the Pacific Ocean on the west, from the Dominion of Canada on the north to the Republic of Mexico and the Gulf of Mexico on the south. The distance across the United States from east to west, through the center, is about 2,600 miles, and from north to south about 1,600 miles. The shortest distance between the Dominion of Canada and the Gulf of Mexico is about 800 miles.

The high mountains and plateaus of the United States are in the western part. There the mining of gold and silver, and the raising of cattle and sheep, constitute the leading occupations of the people.

The plains, prairies, slopes, and lowlands extending from the great highland region eastward to the Atlantic Ocean, are remarkable for their fertile soil, which produces immense crops of grain, cotton, fruits, and vegetables.

The valleys of the Pacific slope are noted for their mild, genial climate and their great yield of wheat, fruits, and vegetables.

Coal and iron are mined extensively in various parts of the United States.

The variety and importance of the products and industries of this country are due principally to its vast extent of territory and its great diversity of soil, elevation, and climate.

Its increase in population, wealth, and power is unsurpassed. A century ago there were but thirteen states, containing less than 4,000,000 inhabitants. Now there are forty-five states, five territories and the District of Columbia, with a total population of more than 65,000,000. A territory is under the control of the General Government of the United States, until it is admitted into the Union as a state by Congress. The original thirteen states were New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. The first states admitted after them were Kentucky, Vermont, Tennessee, Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, and Mississippi.

The first colonies in the region now called the United States were established by the English in Virginia, in 1607; by the Dutch, in New York, in 1613; and by the Pilgrims, in Massachusetts, in 1620. All were subject to Great Britain from 1664 to 1776, when the thirteen colonies declared themselves free and independent states.

Each state has its own constitution, laws, legislature, and governor, while all the states are united under the constitution and laws of the United States. A state is entitled to be represented in the United States Senate by two senators, and in the House of Representatives by one member for every 154,325 inhabitants. Every state is entitled to, at least, one member. A territory may send a delegate to the House, but he has no vote. There are at present 90 senators and 359 members of the House of Representatives. The states which have the largest representation in the House are New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois. The states and territories of the United States have legislatures consisting of two houses similar to those of Congress, elected by the people. They are divided into counties, which are, in some cases, subdivided into townships. The divisions of Louisiana corresponding to counties are called parishes. The highest officials in a state are the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary of State, Attorney-General, and Superintendent of Schools. Towns and villages are collections of houses and inhabitants. Cities have certain rights and privileges not possessed by towns and villages. The affairs of a city are usually controlled by its mayor and common council or aldermen. A county seat is the chief town in which the official business of the county is conducted.

The general government comprises three departments, the legislative, the judicial, and the executive. It has control of all matters pertaining to commerce and treaties with foreign countries, the army and navy, the declaration of war, the post-offices, and the coining of money.

The legislative power is vested in Congress, which consists of the Senate (composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the state legislature for six years; the Vice-President of the United States is the president of the senate), and House of Representatives. Congress hold its sessions in Washington. The session of Congress begins on the first Monday in December of each year. A law cannot take effect unless passed by both the Senate and House of Representatives, and approved by the President. If, however, he disapprove a measure which has been passed by both houses of Congress, it may become a law on being repassed by two-thirds of each house, or if he neglect to sign a bill for ten days it becomes a law.

The judicial power is vested in the Supreme Court, which interprets the laws. The Supreme Court consists of a chief-justice and eight associate justices, all appointed for life by the president with the consent of the Senate.

The executive power is vested in the President, whose duty it is to execute or enforce the laws. He is elected for four years. The President and Vice-President are elected by a number of electors, called the electoral college, chosen by the people of the states, or their legislatures. Each state is entitled to a number of electors, equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which it is entitled in Congress. In case of a vacancy in the office of President, it shall be filled by the Vice-President. If there be no Vice-President, the law of 1886 vests the succession in those members of the cabinet who are constitutionally eligible, in the following order: Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Attorney-General, Postmaster-General, Secretary of the Navy, and Secretary of the Interior.

¶ Public Domain of the United States: The territorial area of the United States is about 4,000,000 square miles, the land surface being estimated at 3,586,006 square miles. In 1800 the public domain consisted of 404,955 square miles, or 259,171,787 acres. To this was added, by purchase from France, in 1802, the colony of Louisiana. This purchase included portions of the States of Alabama and Mississippi south of the thirty-first parallel, the entire area of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, and Oregon, all of Minnesota west of the Missouri River, all of Kansas except a small portion west of the 100th meridian and south of the Arkansas River, all of Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Washington, and Indian Territory, with a part of Wyoming and Colorado.

The cost, according to the stipulations of the treaty, was 60,000,000 francs, or $15,000,000 in money and stocks. The interest on stocks to the time of redemption was $8,529,353. The United States assumed, also, the payment of certain claims of American citizens against France, amounting to $3,738,208, making a total expenditure of $27,267,521. For this sum the Government acquired a title to 1,182,752 square miles of territory, or 756,961,280 acres at 3½ cents per acre. The next acquisition was the purchase of Florida from Spain, in 1819, for $5,000,000. This purchase added to the public domain 59,267 square miles, or 37,981,520 acres at 17½ cents per acre.

The next acquisition was by cession from Mexico, in 1848, of the States of California and Nevada, a part of Colorado, and the Territories of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico. By this transaction there were added to the public domain 522,568 square miles, or 334,443,520 acres, at a cost of $15,000,000, or 4½ cents per acre. The area of the United States was still further increased by the admission of Texas to the Union in 1845. The territory thus acquired amounted to 167,865,600 acres. This increase of territory was consummated after a war with the sister republic of Mexico.

The next addition was that of Alaska, containing 572,500 square miles, purchased from Russia for $7,200,000 in 1867.

Then came the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands in 1898, by which 7,629 square miles were added to our territory.

By the peace protocol signed by representatives of the United States and Spain at Washington, Aug. 12, 1898, it was provided as a condition to preliminary peace that Porto Rico and other Spanish islands in the West Indies and an island in the Ladrones should be ceded to the United States, and that a treaty of peace should determine the control, etc., of the Philippines. [PROTOCOL.] The peace-treaty was signed by the commissioners of the two countries at Paris, Dec. 10, 1898, and provided for the cession to the United States of the Philippine Islands in addition to those named in the protocol. The area of the Philippines is 120,000 square miles, and that of Porto Rico 3,520 square miles. The island (Guam) in the Ladrones and the small Spanish islands in the West Indies contain about 500 square miles, which, together with the Philippines and Porto Rico, make about 124,000 square miles additional territory of the United States.

ū-nīt-ēd'-lŷ, adv. [Eng. united; -ly.] In a united manner; in union; conjointly; jointly.

*ū-nī'-tion, s. [UNITE, v.] The act of uniting; the state or condition of being united.

"Parts separated and disjointed are to be brought together gently and equally, that they may touch one another, and so be prepared for union."—Wiseman: Surgery, bk. v., ch. i.

ū-nīt-ive, a. [Eng. unit(e), v.; -ive.] Having the power or quality of uniting; causing or tending to unite; producing or promoting union.

"That can be nothing else but the unitive way of religion, which consists of the contemplation and love of God."—Norris.

ū-nīt-ive-lŷ, adv. [English unitive; -ly.] In a united or unitive manner. (Cudworth.)

ū-nīt-ize, v. t. [Eng. unit; -ize.] To reduce to a unit or to one; to unify.

ū-nīt-ŷ, *ū-ni-te, *ū-ni-tee, *ū-ni-tie, *ū-ny-te, s. [Fr. unité, from Lat. unitatem, accus. of unitas, from unus=one.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The state or condition of being one; oneness, singleness, as opposed to plurality.

"The unity of God is a true and real, not figurative unity."—Clarke: On the Attributes, prop. 3.

2. Concord, agreement, harmony; oneness of sentiment, affection, or the like.

"How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."—Psalm cxxxiii. 1.

3. Uniformity, harmony, agreement.

"To the avoiding of dissention it availeth much that there be among them an unity as well in ceremonies as in doctrine."—Hooker.

¶ At unity: At one; in accord.

"The King and the Commons were now at unity."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

4. The principle by which a uniform tenor of story and propriety of representation is preserved in literary and dramatic compositions; conformity in a composition to such principle; a reference to some one purpose or leading idea in all the parts of a discourse or composition. In the Greek drama the three unities required were those of action, of time, and of place. This so-called Aristotelian law of unity required that there should be no shifting of the scene from place to place, that the whole series of events should be such as might occur within the space of a single day, and that nothing should be admitted irrelevant to the development of the single plot.

*5. A gold coin of the reign of James I. [UNITE, s., 2.]

II. Technically:

1. Art: That proper balance of composition or color in a work of art which produces a perfectly harmonious effect, and to which all the parts of the work conduce.

2. Law:

(1) (See extract.)

"Unity of possession is a joint possession of two rights by several titles. For example, I take a lease of land from one upon a certain rent; afterward I buy the fee-simple. This is an unity of possession, whereby the lease is extinguished; by reason that I, who had before the occupation only for my rent, am become lord of the same, and am to pay my rent to none."—Cowel.

(2) The holding of the same estate in undivided shares by two or more; joint tenancy.

3. Math.: An entire collection considered as a single thing. Thus, 20 feet, considered as a single distance, is unity; 1 foot is the unit of the expression. The number 1, when unconnected with anything else, is generally called unity.

ū-nīv'-a-lent, a. [Pref. uni-, and Lat. valens, pr. par. of valeo=to be worth.]

Chem.: Equivalent to one unit of any standard, specially to one atom of hydrogen. [MONAD, II. 1.]

ū-nī-vālvē, a. & s. [Pref. uni-, and Eng. valve.]

A. As adj.: Having only one valve, as a shell or pericarp.

B. As substantive:

Zoöl.: A popular name for any of the Gasteropoda (q. v.) inclosed in a univalve shell, which may be regarded essentially as a cone, the apex of which is more or less oblique. In the simplest form the conical shape is retained without any alteration, as is the case with the common limpet. In the majority of instances univalves have the conical shell considerably elongated, so as to form a tube, which may retain this shape, but is usually coiled up into a spiral, and this latter form may be regarded as the typical shell of the Gasteropoda. In some (as in Vermetus) the coils or whorls are hardly in contact, but more commonly they are so amalgamated that the inner side of each convolution is formed by the preëxisting whorl. When the whorls are coiled round a central axis in the same plane, the shell is said to be discoidal, as in Planorbis (q. v.); but, in most cases, they are wound obliquely round the axis, and the shell is termed turreted, trochoid, or turbinated, fusiform, &c.

The animal withdraws into its shell by a retractile muscle, which passes into the foot or is attached to the operculum, its scar or impression being placed in the Spiral Univalves, upon the columella. In the Marine Univalves two important variations exist in the form of the mouth of the shell. In one group, the Holostomata (q. v.), it is unbroken and entire, and these animals live for the most part on vegetable food; in the other group, the Siphonostomata (q. v.), which are mainly carnivorous, the aperture of the shell is notched in front. The shell figured is fusiform; the apex (A) mammillated; the whorls (w) ventricose, strongly ribbed or corrugated, with discontinuous varices (v), and distinct sutures (su); the columella (i) is denticulated; the outer lip (o) is internally plicato-dentate; the body-whorls (b w) are large, and the aperture (a) ovately elliptical; a c and p c mark the anterior and posterior canals respectively.

Univalve.
(Shell of the genus Triton.)

"This class [Gasteropoda] includes all those molluscous animals which are known as Univalves, such as Land-snails, Sea-snails, Whelks, Limpets, &c."—Nicholson: Paleont., ii. 1.

ū-nī-vālvēd, a. [Pref. uni-, and Eng. valved.] Having only one valve; univalve; univalvular.

ū-nī-vāl'-vū-lar, a. [Pref. uni-, and Eng. valvular.] Having but a single valve; univalve.

ū-nī-vēr'-sāl, *ū-ni-ver-sall, a. & s. [French universel, from Lat. universalis=pertaining to the whole, from universum=the whole, prop. neut. sing. of universus=combined into a whole: unus=one, and versus, pa. par. of verto=to turn; O. Fr., Sp., & Port. universal.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. General; pertaining or extending to or comprehending the whole number, quantity, or space; pertaining to or pervading the whole; all-embracing, all-reaching.

"And there is an universal obligation upon all men to obey them."—Leighton: Com. on 1 Peter ii.

2. Constituted or considered as a whole entire; whole, total.

"Sole monarch of the universal earth."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 2.

3. Comprising all the particulars; general.

She doth abstract the universal kinds."

Davies: Immort. of the Soul.

II. Logic: Comprising particulars, or all the particulars.

"The appellations that be universal, and common to many things, are not always given to all the particulars."—Hobbes: Human Nature, ch. v.

B. As substantive:

*I. Ord. Lang.: The whole; the system of the universe.

"To what end had the angel been set to keep the entrance into paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the universal had been paradise?"—Raleigh: Hist. of the World.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: A universal proposition (q. v.).

"As for singular propositions (viz., those whose subject is either a proper name, or a common term with a singular sign) they are reckoned as Universals, because in them we speak of the whole of a subject."—Whately: Logic, bk. ii., ch. ii., § 2.

2. Philosophy (pl.): Universal concepts; general notions or ideas predicable of many; concepts embracing that which by its nature has a fitness or capacity to be in many.

(1) Platonic ideas; archetypal forms existing in the divine mind, and forming the pattern according to which each individual of kind has been created. These have been called also Metaphysical, or, in the language of the Schools, universalia ante rem.

(2) Certain common natures, which, one in themselves, are diffused among or shared in by many; as rationality, which is common to all men. These are called Physical Universals, or universalia in re. [NOMINALISM, REALISM, 3.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, cr, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

(3) General notions framed by the intellect and predicable of many things on the ground of their possessing common properties, e. g., animal, which may be predicated of a man, a lion, a bird, a fish. &c. These are Logical Universals, or universalia post rem.

†(4) The predicables. [PREDICABLE.]

"Abelard was silent until the question of Universals was brought forward, and then suddenly changing from a disciple to an antagonist, he harassed the old man with such rapidity and unexpectedness of assault that William [of Champeaux] confessed himself defeated and retracted his opinion."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), ii. 16.

¶ For the difference between universal and general, see GENERAL.

Law: An agent authorized to do for a principal all the acts which the latter can lawfully delegate. Such devolution of authority very rarely takes place. (Story: Agency.)

universal-chuck, s. A chuck having movable dogs on a face-plate to adapt them to grasp objects of varying sizes.

Universal Church, s.

Theology: The Church of God throughout the world. [CATHOLIC.]

universal-compass, s. A compass with tubular legs containing extension-pieces, which may be drawn out to strike a large circle, and fixed at the required length by screws. The extension-pieces are also tubular, each receiving either leg of a small bow-compass, one having a plain point and pen, and the other a plain point and pencil-holder; these are used as parts of the large compass, but both may be withdrawn and used independently for drawing small circles.

universal-coupling, s. A form of coupling in which the parts united are capable of assuming various angular relations to each other. A gimbal-joint is a familiar instance.

universal-dial, s. A dial by which the hour may be found by the sun in any part of the world, or under any elevation of the pole.

Astron.: A reflecting instrument invented by Prof. Piazzi Smyth. It is a sort of reflecting circle, in which a spirit-level with a very small bubble is so placed that by means of a lens and a totally reflecting prism an image of the bubble is formed at the focus of the telescope, and the coincidence of the center of that image with the cross-wires shows when the line of collimation is truly horizontal.

universal-joint, s.

Mach.: A device for connecting two objects, as the ends of two shafts, so as to allow them to have Universal joints.

1. Ball-and-socket joint. 2. Flexible pipe-joint. 3, 4, 5. Shaft-coupling.

perfect freedom of motion in every direction within certain defined limits. There are numerous forms.

Scots Law: A legacy of all one's property given to a single person.

universal-legatee, s. A legatee to whom the whole estate of a deceased person is given, subject only to the burden of other legacies and debts.

universal-lever, s.

Mech.: A contrivance by means of which the reciprocating motion of a lever is made to communicate a continuous rotatory motion to a wheel, and a continuous rectilinear motion to anything attached by a rope to the axle of the wheel.

universal prime-meridian, s.

Astronomy, &c.: The meridian of Greenwich, adopted at an International Conference of scientific men, held at Washington, D. C., in 1883. Till that time nearly every country had its own prime-meridian—that of England was Greenwich, and that of France Paris; hence an English and a French ship, meeting at sea, would find that there would be a difference of 2° 20' between the records of their longitude, since Paris is 2° 20' east of Greenwich. The conference decided that this anomaly should be abolished, and that longitude should be reckoned only from the meridian of Greenwich, and that it should count 180° east and 180° west; so that in future all maps will be constructed on this principle, and ships of every nation meeting at sea, will find themselves in the same degree of longitude. [UNIVERSAL-TIME.]

universal-proposition, s.

Logic: A proposition in which the predicate is said of the whole of the subject: Thus, All tyrants are miserable, is a universal affirmative proposition (having the symbol A); No miser is rich, is a universal negative proposition (having the symbol O) [See also examples under UNIVERSAL, II. 1.]

universal-religion, s.

Compar. Relig.: A missionary religion (q. v.); a faith intended to be preached to all men, as distinguished from a tribal or national cult.

"Of universal religions there are at most only three, and Prof. Kuenen would almost seem to deny the right of Islam to be admitted into the class."—Athenæum, Oct. 14, 1882, p. 482.

universal-successor, s.

Scots Law: An heir who succeeds to the whole of the heritage of a person who dies intestate.

universal-suffrage, s.

Hist.: Suffrage which accords a vote to every man in the community. It is called in France Plebiscite (q. v.). In England it was the first point of the Charter advocated by the Chartists in 1838 and the subsequent years. In this country suffrage is subject to the regulation of the laws of the different states. Advocates of women's suffrage contend that a franchise confined to men is not universal.

Astron., &c.: A method of reckoning time for international purposes, agreed on by the International Conference, held at Washington, D. C., in 1883. Universal time is reckoned from mean noon at the universal prime-meridian (q. v.), the day commencing at midnight, and divided into twenty-four (instead of into two portions of twelve) hours each. Local time will still be used for local purposes; but the method of fixing it will be changed. Since the earth is divided into 360° and the day into 24 hours, every 15° will represent the difference of an hour in time. If the earth be divided into 24 equal parts, at every fifteenth meridian, and if the local mean noon of each of such meridians be adopted as the standard noon of all places 7½° each side of it, it will follow that when it is noon at Greenwich and at all places within 7½° of Greenwich, it will be eleven o'clock by local (but still noon by universal) time for all places between 7½° and 22½° west of Greenwich, and thirteen o'clock by local (but still noon by universal) time for all places between 7½° and 22½° east of Greenwich, and so on throughout the world. Universal time will be the same universally, and local time will differ from it only by even hours, instead of by the various odd minutes by which local standards differ from each other at the present time; while in no case will the difference between standard noon and absolute noon at any place exceed half an hour, since a difference of 7½° of longitude equals a difference of half an hour in time.

Botany: An umbel consisting of various partial umbels.

u-ni-vēr-sā'-lī-an*, a. [Eng. universal; -ian.] Of or pertaining to Universalism (q. v.).

Ū-ni-vēr-sal-izm, s. [Eng. universal; -ism.]

1. Church History:

their doctrine from Scripture, quoting in support of it Matt. xxv. 46, John xvii. 3, 1 Cor. xv. 22, Phil. ii. 10, Eph. i. 10, Col. i. 19, 20, and 1 Tim. iv. 10. Universalism is better known as a distinct sect in America than in England. In 1827 a division arose among the American Universalists concerning punishment after death, some asserting it to be limited, while others denied it altogether. Some separated from the main body and called themselves "The Massachusetts Association of Restorationists." Most of them afterward joined the Free-Will Baptists or the Unitarians, while the others returned to the main body. In 1840 the whole sect divided into two, the Impartialists and the Restorationists. But Universalism is also held by many members of other sects, and practically by all Theists strictly so called.

(2) A name sometimes given to Arminianism (q. v.), because it maintains that Christ died for all men, not merely for the elect. [CALVINISM.]

(3) The doctrine that the mission of Christ was to all men, not merely to the Jews; Paulinism (q. v.).

"The Fourth Gospel again . . . is the Gospel of Universalism in the highest degree."—Matthew Arnold: God and the Bible, 229.

2. Compar. Relig.: The state or condition of embracing or being suited for the acceptance of all men. [UNIVERSAL-RELIGION.]

"The denial of true universalism to Islam is somewhat contradicted by the fact that it is at the present day spreading more than either Christianity or Buddhism."—Athenæum, Oct. 14, 1882, p. 490.

ū-ni-vēr-sal-ist, s. & a. [Eng. universal; -ist.]

A. As substantive:

*1. Ord. Lang.: One who pretends to understand all statements or propositions.

"For a modern free-thinker is an universalist in speculation; any proposition whatsoever he's ready to decide; every day de quolibet ente, as our author here professes."—Bentley: On Free Thinking, § 3.

2. Church History:

(1) One who believes in the final salvation of all rational beings.

(2) An Arminian (q. v.).

(3) One who believes that the mission of Jesus was to all men; not to the Jews only.

"The advanced Universalist means to indicate that the multitudes of the heathen world may be brought into Christianity without any such disruption of the Christian Church as to his faint-hearted predecessor had seemed inevitable."—Matthew Arnold: God and the Bible, p. 229.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to any form of Universalism.

ū-ni-vēr-sal-ist'-ic, adj. [English universal; -istic.] Of, relating to, or affecting the whole; universal.

"Egoistic and universalistic hedonism."—Prof. Jevons.

ū-ni-vēr-sāl'-ī-tŷ, u-ni-ver-sal-i-tie*, s. [Fr. universalité, from Low Lat. universalitatem, accus. of universalitas, from Lat. universalis=universal (q. v.).] The quality or state of being universal, or of extending to the whole.

"Universality belongs not to things themselves, which are all of them particular in their existence."—Locke: Human Understand., bk. iii., ch. iii.

ū-ni-vēr-sal-ize, v. t. [Eng. universal; -ize.] To make universal; to generalize.

ū-ni-vēr-sal-ly, u-ny-ver-sal-ly*, adv. [Eng. universal; -ly.] In a universal manner; with extension to the whole; without exception; so as to comprehend or extend to all; generally.

"The consequence was that he was more universally detested than any man of his time."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

ū-ni-vēr-sal-nēss*, s. [Eng. universal; -ness.] The quality or state of being universal; universality. (Richardson.)

ū-ni-vēr-se, s. [French univers, from Latin universum, neut. sing. of universus=all together, the whole.] The general system of things; all created things viewed as constituting one system or whole; the world; the to pan=the whole, of the Greeks, and the mundus of the Latins.

"O for a clap of thunder now, as loud
As to be heard throughout the universe."
Ben Jonson: Catiline, i. 1.

ū-ni-vēr-sīl'-tŷ, u-ni-ver-sit-e*, u-ny-ver-sit-ee*, s. [Fr. université, from Lat. universitatem, accus. of universitas=the whole of anything, the universe; later, an association, corporation, company, &c.; from universus=universal (q. v.); Sp. universidad; Ital. università.]

*1. The whole universe; the world.

"Oure tunge is fier, the unversitee of wickidnesse."—Wycliffe: James iii. 56.

*2. A corporation, a guild, an association.

3. Now, specifically, an establishment or corporation for the purpose of instruction in all or some of the most important sciences and literature, and having power to confer certain honorary dignities, called degrees, in several faculties, as arts, science, medicine, law, theology, &c. When the term came first to be applied to seminaries of learning, it was used to signify either the whole body of learners and teachers, or the whole body of learners, with corporate rights, and under by-laws of their own, divided either by faculty or by country (whence the division into nations in the Scotch and some of the European continental universities), or both together, the particular meaning being determined by the words with which it was connected. Such phrases as Universitas magistrorum et auditorum (or scholarium), meaning the whole body of teachers and scholars, are met with at the very beginning of the thirteenth century. As applied to Oxford, such an expression is found in a document belonging to the year 1301. In the following century the Latin term universitas acquired a technical sense, and came to be used by itself much in the same sense as we now use the English word University. In most cases the corporations constituting universities include a body of teachers or professors for giving instruction to students; but this is not essential to a university, the University of London being simply an examining body. A common idea of a university (founded probably on the word itself, and also on the fact that the best-known universities consist of several colleges) is that a university is an aggregate or union of several colleges, that is, a great corporation embodying in one several smaller and subordinate collegiate bodies; but such is not necessarily the case, as some universities consist of but one college. The three oldest universities are those of Bologna, Paris, and Oxford, the first-named having already acquired great celebrity as a school of law in the early part of the twelfth century. The practice of granting degrees originated at Paris in the second half of the same century. The earliest divisions of students and teachers was into nations, at Paris there being four and at Bologna seventeen or eighteen nations. The division into faculties did not arise till the thirteenth century.

¶ Among American universities and colleges, of which there are about 400, the following are the most important: Harvard, Cambridge, Mass., founded 1638; William and Mary, Williamsburg, Va., 1693; Yale, New Haven, Conn., 1700; Princeton, Princeton, N. J., 1746; Columbia, New York city, N. Y., 1754; University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 1755; Brown University, Providence, R. I., 1764; Dartmouth, Hanover, N. H., 1769; Rutgers, New Brunswick, N. J., 1770; Wesleyan, Middletown, Conn., 1830; Johns Hopkins, Baltimore, Md., 1876; Amherst, Amherst, Mass., 1821; Williams, Williamstown, Mass., 1793; University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, 1841; Dickinson, Carlisle, Pa., 1783; Washington and Lee, Lexington, Va., 1749; University of Virginia, Charlottesville, 1825; Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., 1868; Union, Schenectady, N. Y., 1795; Bowdoin, Brunswick, Me., 1798; Trinity, Hartford, Conn., 1823; University of California, Oakland, 1855; University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill., 1891; Leland Stanford, Jr., California, 1891; Vanderbilt, Nashville, Tenn., 1875.

University extension, s. The name given to a scheme inaugurated in England by which many of the advantages of university teaching are brought within the reach of the inhabitants of the other than university towns. Called also Local Lectures Scheme.

1. The Cambridge scheme: In 1872 the University of Cambridge appointed a syndicate to organize lectures by university men, and conduct classes in suitable places. The lectures are of a similar character to those given at Cambridge, and in addition to being largely attended, have led, in the case of Nottingham and Sheffield, to the establishment of permanent institutions for higher education.

2. The London scheme: This dates from 1878, when some London residents formed the "London Society for the Extension of University Teaching," and secured the cooperation of the Universities of Cambridge, Oxford and London, each agreeing to nominate three distinguished persons as a "joint board," and this joint board of nine undertaking to select lecturers, examiners, &c., and to advise generally. Over thirty local centers have been constituted in connection with this chief body. The lectures are in courses of ten or twelve, are always accompanied with class teaching, and conclude with an examination (free) by some independent examiner.

3. Durham scheme: In 1879 lectures were organized in connection with this university on a similar plan to that adopted in the Cambridge scheme; but in 1883 the whole management was transferred to the Cambridge Syndicate.

4. Oxford scheme: In 1885 the scheme which had been started some years earlier, but had been temporarily abandoned, was revived. The courses have hitherto been mostly short courses averaging six lectures each.

5. Victoria University: A few short courses are given at a few towns in Lancashire.

6. The Scottish scheme: The Scottish universities are cooperating to introduce a scheme of lectures similar to the Cambridge scheme into Scotland. It has already been started at a few towns.

7. American Universities: In several American university towns the Extension scheme has been adopted successfully.

ũ-nĩ-vēr'-sīt-ỹ-lěss, adj.* [English university; -less.] Having no university; destitute of a university.

ũ-nĩ-vēr-sō-lōg'-ic-āl, a.* [English universology (y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to the science of universology.

ũ-nĩ-vēr-sōl'-ō-gĩst, s.* [Eng. universologist (y); -ist.] One who makes a special study of universology.

ũ-nĩ-vēr-sōl'-ō-gỹ, s.* [Eng. univers(e); suff. -ology.] The science of the universe. A science intended to cover the whole ground of philosophy, the exact and physical sciences, and sociology.

ũ-nĩv'-ō-cā-čỹ, s.* [Eng. univocal (l); -cy.] The quality or state of being univocal.

ũ-nĩv'-ō-cāl, a. & s.* [Lat. univocus, from unus = one, and vox (genit. vocis) = a voice, a sound; Fr. univoque.]

A. As adjective:

1. Having only one meaning; having the meaning certain and unmistakable.

"Univocal words are such as signify but one idea, or at least but one sort of thing; . . . house, elephant, may be called univocal words, for I know not that they signify anything else but those ideas to which they are generally affixed."—Watts: Logic, bk. i., ch. iv.

2. Having unison in sounds; as the octave in music and its replicates.

3. Certain, regular; pursuing always one tenor.

"This conceit . . . conceives unequivocal effects, and univocal conformity unto the efficient."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

4. Certain, sure; not to be doubted or mistaken.

"They are commonly the true mothers, the univocal parents of their productions."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. ii., ch. iii.

B. As subst.: A word having only one meaning or signification; a generic word, or a word predicable of many different species, as fish, tree, &c.

ũ-nĩv'-ō-cāl-ly, adv.* [Eng. univocal; -ly.]

1. In a univocal manner; in one sense; unmistakably, unequivocally.

"How is sin univocally distinguished into venial and mortal, if the venial bee no sinne?"—Ep. Hall: No Peace with Rome, § 13.

2. In one tenor.

"All creatures are generated univocally by parents of their own kind; there is no such thing as spontaneous generation."—Ray: On the Creation.

ũ-nĩv'-ō-cā'-tion, s.* [UNIVOCAL.] Agreement of uame and meaning.

"The univocation of Tartar cities with those of Israel."—Whiston. Mem. (1749), p. 583.

ũn-jar'-rĩng, adj.* [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. jar-ring.] Harmonious. (Adams: Works, ii. 294.)

ũn-jāun'-dĩced, a.* [Pref. un- (1), and English jaundiced.] Not jaundiced; hence, not affected with envy, jealousy, or the like; unprejudiced.

"With an unjaundiced eye."

Cowper: To Dr. Darwin.

ũn-jěal'-oũs, a.* [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. jealous.] Not jealous; free from jealousy.

"The gentle and unjealous temper of the king."—Clarendon: Papal Usurpation, vol. i., ch. x.

ũn-jōĩn', v. t.* [Pref. un- (2), and Eng. join.] To separate; to disjoin.

1. Ord. Lang.: Bread made without leaven or barm.

2. Church Hist.: Unleavened bread is used in the Roman Church for the celebration of mass and the administration of the Eucharist, while the Greeks use leavened bread. In the English Church the Rubric directs that the bread "shall be such as is usual to be eaten," and an attempt to revive the use of unleavened bread has been declared illegal.

¶ Feast of Unleavened Bread:

Judaism: A festival so connected with that of the Passover that the two are all but identified (Exod. xii. 11, 17; Ezek. xlv. 21). It celebrated the fact that in the exodus from Egypt on the night when the Passover was killed the departure of the Israelites was so sudden, that there was no time to bake bread in the usual way with leaven (Exod. xii. 39). The eating of unleavened bread annually at the festival was therefore enjoined as a religious duty, and neither leavened bread nor leaven was to be within the houses of the worshipers during the seven days that the festival continued. (Exod. xii. 14-20, xiii. 6, 7). [PASSOVER.]

Biol.: A functionless eye formed on the Invertebrate type, and filling up the space between the brain and the parietal foramen. It was first found in Sphenodon (q. v.); further investigation led to its discovery in all the living Lacertilia in which a parietal foramen exists (Spencer, in Quart. Jour. Micros. Soc., n. s. xxvii.), and has since been traced in Fishes by Beard of Freiburg (Nature, July 14, 1887). Thus in the same vertebrate animal are eyes developed on the vertebrate and on the invertebrate type, and formed from the modification of the walls of hollows in, and outgrowths of, the brain. In Sphenodon, which has been the subject of most of the investigations, this eye has, in section, the shape of a cone, the base of which fills the foramen, while the pineal stalk (p. s.) is connected with the apex. The walls of the optic vesicle (o. v.) are divided into an anterior and a posterior part, the first forming the lens (l.), and the other the sensitive structures, all nourished by a blood-vessel (b. v.). The lens is apparently directly the product of the brain-wall itself. The retinal elements (r.) are arranged in the manner typical of Invertebrates—the rods lie on the inner side, bounding the cavity of the optic vesicle, the nerve entering posteriorly, and not spreading out in front of the rods. In all living forms this eye is in a state of greater or less degeneration, but it was most probably functional in the Labyrinthodonts in which the parietal foramen was very large, and had its sides corrugated, as if for the attachment of muscles.

Unpaired Eye of Sphenodon.

3. A false statement or assertion; a falsehood, a lie. (In this sense there is a plural, un-trūths.)

"Whom want itself can force untruths to tell."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xiv. 180.

¶ Untruth is an untrue saying; falsehood is a false saying, untruth of itself reflects no disgrace on the agent; it may be unintentional or not; a falsehood is an intentional false saying; an untruth is not always spoken for the express intention of deceiving. Some persons have a habit of telling falsehoods from the mere love of talking. Children are apt to speak untruths for want of understanding the value of words; travelers from a love of exaggeration are apt to introduce falsehoods into their narrations. Falsehood is also used in the abstract sense for what is false. Falsity is never used but in the abstract sense, for the property of the false. The former is general, the latter particular in the application; the truth or falsehood of an assertion is not always to be distinctly proved; the falsity of any particular person's assertion may be proved by the evidence of others.

un-trūth'-fūl, a. [Pref. un- (1), and Eng. truthful.] Not truthful; wanting in veracity.

"Witness then found out that the prisoner was untruthful."—London Daily Telegraph.

un-twīne', v. t. & i. [Pref. un- (2), and English twine, v.]

A. Transitive:

1. To untwist: to open and separate, as something that has been twined or twisted.

"There ends thy glory! there the Fates untwine

The last black remnant of so bright a line."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xvi. 950.

2. To separate, as that which clasps or winds; to cause to cease winding round and clinging.

"And let the stinking elder, grief, untwine

His perishing root."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iv. 2.

*3. To explain; to solve.

"This knot might be untwined with more facilitie thus."—Holinshed: Sundrie Invasions of Ireland.

B. Intrans.: To become untwined or untwisted. "His silken braids untwine, and slip their knots."—Milton: Divorce, bk. i., ch. vi.

Hindu Sacred Lit. (pl.): Vedic speculative treatises occupied with attempts to solve problems bôil, bôy; pout, jowl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian. -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şûn; -tîon, -şion = zhûn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şûş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

connected with the universe and the nature and destiny of man. They are 108 or more in number, each Veda having a certain number of Upanishads connected with it. They constitute part of the Brahmanas or commentaries belonging to the Veda, presenting the Vedic doctrine in a comprehensive form, and being of a more dogmatic character than the rest of the Brahmanas. They vary in date like the Brahmanas, which extend, according to Max Müller, from 800 to 600 B. C. [BRAHMANISM.] All Indian philosophers and various sects profess to derive their belief from the Upanishads. [VEDA.]

ū-pās, subst. [Malay ūpas=poison.] The Upas-tree (q. v.).

Toxicol. & Bot.: The poison of Strychnostiente, a climbing shrub growing in Java. The natives use it to poison their arrows, its deleterious effects being produced by the presence of strychnine.

upas-tree, s.

Bot.: Antiaris toxicaria, a large tree growing in Java. Stem naked for the first sixty, seventy, or eighty feet of its height; leaves alternate, stipulate, entire, unequal-sided, subcordate, costately-veined; flowers in axillary or lateral drooping peduncles, monœcious; males numerous, enclosed in a hairy involucre, calyx with three or four divisions, anthers sessile, three or four; females solitary, calyx in several divisions with a long bipartite style, and ultimately bearing a succulent, drupaceous fruit. The inspissated juice of the upas-tree constitutes a virulent poison called by the natives antjar, which owes its deleterious character to the presence of strychnine. The smallest wound by an arrow tipped with this poison is fatal. Toward the close of the eighteenth century a Dutch surgeon, Foersch, circulated in Europe various myths with regard to the upas-tree. It was said to be so deadly that the poison was collected by criminals condemned to death, who obtained their pardon if they brought away the poison, which was, however, found fatal to eighteen out of every twenty who made the attempt. It was destructive to all vegetable life but its own, and grew in the midst of a desert which it had made. It is now known that the upas-tree was credited with the destruction of animal life really attributable to the escape of carbon dioxide from a vent or vents in a valley surrounded by volcanoes. It has been seen growing with other trees in forests, and in 1844 was introduced into foreign hothouses with no deleterious effect.

Upas-tree.

"Prior to that great religious upheaval the monks were the principal professors of dentistry."—London Daily Telegraph.

2. Geol.: The sudden elevation of land, or its slow rise through volcanic or earthquake action. This elevation is popularly attributed, as it was by the early geologists, to a recession of the sea; no portion of which, however, could recede without producing a universal fall in the level of the ocean. No known natural cause could produce such a phenomenon, and the popular hypothesis is embarrassed by the necessity of explaining what has become of the water which has disappeared, and why certain strata are not horizontal, but slanted at all angles or disposed in curves. These difficulties do not arise when it is held that the permanent recession of the ocean is only apparent; the water has remained at its own level, and it is the land that has risen. This rise of the land, though often very extensive, is still in each successive case only a local phenomenon. [UPTHROW.]

"The evidence of upheaval in the atoll regions of the Pacific."—Nature, Ap. 26, 1888, p. 604.

ŭp'-stāy', v. t. [Eng. up, and stay, v.] To sustain, to support.

"The tenth on bended knee His massy spear upstaid."—Milton: P. L., vi. 195.

ŭp'-stīr, *up-stirre, s. [Eng. up, and stir, s.] A commotion, a tumult, a rising.

"Better redresse was entended, then your upstirres and unquietnesse coulde obtaine."—Cheeke: Hurt of Sedition.

ŭp'-strōke, subst. [English up, and stroke.] An upward line made by a pen or pencil in writing.

ŭp'-stŷ', *up-stey, v. i. [Eng. up, and sty (2), v.] To rise.

"Leeue me, forsothe now vpsteyeth the morewetime."—Wycliffe: Gen. xxxiii. 26.

ŭp'-stŷ'-īng, *up-sty-enge, subst. [UPSTY.] Ascension.

"For grate wonder that the lower aungelles had of his upstyenge."—The Festival (1528), fo. xli.

ŭp'-sūn, subst. [Eng. up, and sun.] The time during which the sun is above the horizon; the time between sunrise and sunset.

ŭp'-sūp', v. t. [Eng. up, and sup.] To sip, drink up, or absorb.

"The tears berain my cheeks of deadly hue!
The which as soon as sobbing sighs, alas!
Upsupped have, thus I my plaint renew."

Surrey: A Prisoner in Windsor Castle

ŭp'-swārm', v. t. & i. [Eng. up, and swarm.]

A. Transitive: To raise in swarms; to cause to swarm up.

"You . . . against the peace of heaven and him Havo here upswarmed them."
Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., iv. 2.

B. Intrans.: To rise in swarms; to swarm up.

"Upswarming show'd
On the high battlement their glitt'ring spears."
Cowper: Homer's Iliad, xii.

ŭp'-swāy', v. t. [English up, and sway, v.] To sway or swing up; to brandish.

"That right-hand Giant 'gan his club upsway,
As one that startles from a heavy sleep."
Scott: Don Roderick, xvi.

ŭp'-swēll', v. i. [English up, and swell, v.] To swell up, to rise up.

"Our firste foe, the serpent Sathanas, Upswal and sayde: O Ēbreik peple, allas!"
Chaucer: C. T., 13,490.

ŭp'-sŷ'-tūr-vŷ, adverb. [TOPSYTURVY.] Upside down; topsyturvy.

"There found I all way upsyturvy turned."
Greene: James IV., iii. 3.

ŭp'-tāilŷ āll, phr. [Eng. up; tails, and all.]

1. Confusion; high jinks.

"Love he doth call For his uptailles all."
Herrick: Hesperides, p. 265.

2. Good fellows; revelers.

"Feel, my uptails all, feel my weapon."

Decker: Satiromastix.

3. An old game at cards.

"Ruff, slam, whisk, uptails all, new cut."

Poor Robin (1757).

ŭp'-tāke, v. t. [Eng. up, and take.]

1. To take up; to take into the hand.

"He hearkened to his reason, and the child Uptaking."
Spenser: F. Q., II. ii. 11.

2. To succor, to help.

"The right hond of my iust man uptook thee."—Wycliffe: Isaiah xli. 10.

ŭp-tāke', s. [UPTAKE, v.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Conception, understanding, apprehension. (Prov.)

"Everybody's no sae gleg at the uptake as ye are your sell, mither."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. vii.

2. Steam.: The upcast pipe from the smoke-box of a steam-boiler furnace, leading to the chimney or stack.

ŭp-tāk'-ēr, s. [Eng. uptak(e); -er.] A helper, a supporter.

"Thou art my fadir, and the uptaker of my heelthe."—Wycliffe: Ps. lxxxviii.

ŭp-teār', v. t. [Eng. up, and tear, v.] To tear up; to pull or pluck up.

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aŷ; expect, Xenophon, exīst. ph = f.
-clan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tīon, -sīon = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -slous = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl

ŭp'-thrōw, s. [UPTHROW, v.]

Geology: Essentially the same as UPHEAVAL (q. v.), but used chiefly in describing the difference of level on the two sides of a fault.

ŭp'-thrōw, v. t. [Eng. up, and throw, v.] To throw up; to cast or hurl up.

"And soon the tempest so outrageous grew,
That it whole hedgerows by the roots upthrew."
Drayton: The Moon-Calf.

ŭp-thŭn'-dē, v. i. [Eng. up, and thunder, v.] To send up a noise like thunder.

"Central fires through nether seas upthundering."
Coleridge: To the Departing Year.

ŭp-tie, v. t. [Eng. up, and tie, v.] To tie or twist up; to wind up.

"Having all his band againe uptyde."
Spenser: F. Q., VI. iv. 24.

ŭp-tōwn, a. [Eng. up, and town.] Situated in, living in, or belonging to the upper part of a town; as, uptown people. Used also adverbially.

ŭp-trāce, v. t. [English up, and trace, v.] To trace up; to follow up; to investigate.

ŭp-trāin, v. t. [English up, and train, v.] To train up; to bring up; to educate.

"Three fair daughters that were well uptrained."
Spenser: F. Q., II. x. 27.

ŭp-trill, v. t. [Eng. up, and trill.] To sing or trill in a high voice.

"The long-breath'd singer's uptrilled strain."
Coleridge: In a Concert-Room.

ŭp-tŭrn, v. t. [Eng. up, and turn, v.]

1. To turn up; to direct upward.

"Her hands were clasp'd—her eyes upturned."
Moore: The Fire-Worshippers.

2. To overturn; to throw up; to turn over.

"Boreas and Cæcias and Argestes loud And Thrascias rend the woods and seas upturn."
Milton: P. L., x. 700.

ŭp-tŭrned, a. [Pref. up- and English turned.] Turned so that the bottom becomes the top.

"To make a seat of an upturned bushel basket."—Star, Feb. 14, 1888.

ŭ'-pū-pa, s. [Lat., connected with Gr. epops=the hoopoe (q. v.).]

Ornith.: The sole genus of Upipidae (q. v.), with bill long, slender, slightly arched, sharp, and much compressed; nostrils basal, oval, partly concealed by feathers; tongue very short and heart-shaped; head with an erectile crest of oblong feathers, set regularly in pairs for the whole length; wings moderately long, very broad, with ten primaries; tail of ten feathers, almost square at the end, feet with the tarsi scutellated behind as well as before; three toes before, one behind, outer and middle united as far as first joint; claws but slightly curved. One species, Upupa epops, the Common Hoopoe is a summer visitor to the temperate regions of Europe.

Upupa Epops
With crest erected and depressed.

u-pū-pī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. upupa(a); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of semi-terrestrial, insectivorous Picarian Birds whose nearest affinities are with the Hornbills. It contains a single genus, Upupa (q. v.), characteristic of the Ethiopian region, but extending into the south of Europe and into all the continental divisions of the Oriental region, as well as to Ceylon, and northward to Pekin and Mongolia. (Wallace.) The Wood-hoopoes (q. v.), were formerly placed in this family, but now more generally constitute the family Iridoridæ, with the single genus Irisor.

ŭp-waft'-ēd, a. [Eng. up, and wafted.] Wafted upward; carried up or aloft.

"Mingled his taint with every breath Upwafted from the innocent flowers!"
Moore: Paradise and the Pert.

ŭp-ward, up-ward, uppe-ward, up-pard, adv., adj., & s. [Eng. up, and -ward.]

A. As adverb:

1. Toward a higher place or position; upward.

"All his sad companions upward gaze, Fixed on the glorious scene in wild amaze."
Pope: Statius; Thebaid, i. 644.

2. With respect to the upper or higher part or parts.

"Dagon, sea-monster; upward man,
And downward fish." Milton: P. L., i. 462.

3. More. (Used indefinitely.)

"I am a very foolish, fond old man, Fourscore and upward, not an hour more or less."
Shakesp.: Lear, iv. 7.

4. Toward the source or origin.

"Thence your maxims bring,
And trace the muses upward to their spring."
Pope: Essay on Criticism, 127.

5. Noting progress or advance in years or life; on.

"From the age of xliii. yerres uppewarde."—Elyot: Governor, bk. i., ch. xvi.

B. As adjective:

1. Directed or turned upward.

"Titinius' face is upward."
Shakesp.: Julius Cæsar, v. 3.

2. Toward the source or origin.

"Entirely arresting their upward migration."—Field, Dec. 31, 1887.

3. Toward a higher price or value.

"Feeding materials of all kinds are unusually reasonable just now, although an upward tendency is apparent."—Field, Oct. 3, 1885.

C. As subst.: The top, the summit.

"From the extremest upward of thy head To the descent and dust below thy foot."
Shakesp.: Lear, v. 3.

ŭp-ward-lŷ, adv. [Eng. upward; -ly.] In an upward direction; upward.

"Upwardly opening valves."—Knight: Dict. Mechanics, s. v. Ventilator.

ŭp-wardſ, adv. [UPWARD.]

1. Toward a higher place; in an upward direction. (Opposed to downward.)

2. Toward the source or spring.

3. More.

"Some of them worth as much as £30 and upwards."—London Daily Chronicle.

¶ Upwards of: More than; above; in excess of; as, He has been here upwards of ten years.

ŭp-whirl, v. i. & t. [Eng. up, and whirl.]

A. Intrans.: To rise upward in a whirl; to whirl upward.

B. Trans.: To raise upward in a whirling direction.

ŭp-wind, v. t. [Eng. up, and wind, v.] To wind up; to roll up; to involve. (Spenser: F. Q., I. i. 15.) ŭp-wind, adv. [Eng. up, and wind, s.] Against or in the face of the wind.

"For, though upwind now, they could merely hunt."—Field, Feb. 4, 1888.

ŭp-wound, pa. par. or a. [UPWARD.]

ŭp-wreath, v. i. [Eng. up, and wreath, v.] To curl upward.

ŭr'-a-chŭs, s. [Gr. ouron=urine, and echō=to have.]

Anat.: A fibrous cord connecting the summit of the bladder with the anterior abdominal wall, passing upward between the linea alba and the peritoneum to the umbilicus. In foetal life the urachus connects the bladder with the allantois.

u-răc'-ō-nite, u-răc'-ō-nise, subst. [English ura(nium), and Gr. konis=dust.]

Min.: A mineral of undetermined crystalline form, occurring in exceedingly minute scales, or earthy, on uraninite (q. v.), at Joachimsthal, Bohemia. Color, lemon-yellow, sometimes orange. Composition: Essentially a hydrated sulphate of the sesquioxide of uranium.

u-răc'-mī-a, s. [Gr. ouron=urine, and haima=blood.]

Pathol.: A disease caused by the retention of urea and other noxious substances in the kidneys and bladder, followed by blood poisoning. It is produced by any cause which prevents the periodical excretion of the urine, and is a most dangerous malady. It takes three forms: Stupor, followed by coma, convulsions of an epileptic type, or coma and convulsions combined. [ALBUMINURIA.]

u-răc'-mīc, a. [Mod. Lat. uræmic(ia); Eng. suff. -ic.] Of or belonging to uræmia; as, uræmic coma, uræmic intoxication, uræmic poisoning.

Ūr'-al, s. [See def.]

Geog.: The name of a range of mountains about 1,250 miles long, constituting the northeastern boundary of Europe.

Ural Altaic, a.

Philol.: The same as TURANIAN.

Ū-rā'-lī-an, adj. [See def.] Of or pertaining to the Ural Mountains, in Russia.

Ū-rāl'-ic, a. [See def.] Of or pertaining to the Ural Mountains; specifically applied to the languages of the Finnic tribes, from it being generally supposed that the original seat of such tribes was in the Ural Mountains.

ŭr'-al-ite, s. [After the Ural Mountains, where it was first observed; suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. uralit.] Min.: An altered form of Augite (q. v.), where the exterior form of the crystal is preserved, but the cleavage is that of hornblende. The crystals appear to be composed of a number of minute prisms of hornblende. First made known by H. Rose, as occurring in a green porphyritic rock in the Urals, but it has since been found to be very abundant in many rocks.

Petrol.: A porphyry in which the mineral uralite is a prominent constituent.

uralite-syenite, s.

Petrol.: A variety of syenite (q. v.), occurring near the village of Turgojak, in the Ural Mountains, which contains uralite.

ŭr-al-orth'-ite, s. [After the Ural Mountains, where found, and Eng. orthite.]

Min.: A variety of Allanite (q. v.), occurring in large dull crystals in the Ilmen Mountains, Urals. Hardness, 60; specific gravity, 3.41-3.647; color, pitch-black.

u-rām'-il, subst. [English ur(anic), and amil.] [DIALURAMIDE.]

ŭr-a-mīl'-ic, adj. [Eng. uramil; -ic.] Derived from or containing uramil.

uramilic-acid, s.

Chemistry: C₈H₁₀N₅O₇ (?). Dialuramic acid. Obtained by boiling a solution of dialuramide in sulphuric acid. It crystallizes in transparent four-sided prisms or in silky needles, soluble in water and nitric and sulphuric acids, insoluble in alcohol and ether. With the alkalies it forms crystallizable salts.

u-răn, s. [See def.] A contraction of Uranium (q. v.).

uran-mica, s.

Min.: The same as URANITE (q. v.).

ŭr'-an-ate, s. [Eng. uran(ic); -ate.]

Chem. (pl.): Compounds of the uranic oxide with basic metallic oxides. (Watts.)

u-răn-a-tēm'-nīte, s. [Eng. uran(ium); Gr. a=negative, and temnō=to cut.]

Min.: The same as URANIN.

u-rā'-nē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin uran(ia); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -ææ.]

Botany: A tribe of Musaceæ. Seeds numerous in each cell; fruit berried, or, if capsular, bursting through the cells. (Lindley.)

Ū-rā'-nī-a, subst. [Lat., from Gr. Ourania=the Heavenly one, later regarded as the muse who presides over astronomy.]

1. Classic Mythology:

(1) The muse of Astronomy, usually represented as holding in one hand a globe, in the other a rod, with which she is employed in tracing out some figure.

(2) A surname of Venus=Celestial. She was said to be the daughter of Uranus or Cælus by the Light, and was supposed to preside over beauty and generation.

2. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 30.]

3. Botany: The typical genus of Uranææ (q. v.). Only known species, Urania speciosa (Ravenala madagascariensis). [RAVENALA.] It has leaves of giant size, small axillary flowers, and fruits bearing seeds, surrounded by an aril of an ultramarine color. It yields an essential oil, and the capsules a dye.

4. Entom.: The typical genus of Uraniidæ (q. v.). Splendid lepidopterous insects, often about three inches across the wings, which are transversely banded with black and green, the hinder pair terminating posteriorly in a long tail, sometimes edged with white. All the species are South American. Urania fulgens migrates in large flocks across the Isthmus of Panama.

Ū-rā'-nī-an (1), a. [Eng. Urani(a); -an.]

Mythol.: Of or belonging to heaven; heavenly, celestial. Used of Venus when regarded as the patroness of heavenly or chaste love. Or it may refer to her being the daughter of Uranus. [URANIA, 1, (2).]

"The seal was Cupid bent above a scroll, And o'er his head Uranian Venus hung."
Tennyson: Princess, i. 239.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

Ū-rā-nī-an (2), a. [Modern Latin, &c., uranus (q. v.), i connect., and Eng. suff. -an.]
Astron.: Of or belonging to the planet Uranus.

"The most singular circumstance attending the whole Uranian system."—Ball: Story of the Heavens, p. 169.

ū-rān'-īc (1), a. [URANUS.] Of or pertaining to the heavens; celestial, astronomical.

ū-rān'-īc (2), a. [Eng. uran(ium); -ic.] Contained in or derived from uranium (q. v.).

uranic-nitrate, s.

Chem.: $(\text{UO}_2)''(\text{NO}_3)_2 \cdot 6\text{H}_2\text{O}$. Prepared by dissolving pulverized pitchblende in nitric acid, evaporating to dryness, adding water, filtering, and allowing filtrate to crystallize. It is soluble in water and alcohol.

Chem.: UO_3 . Uranyl oxide. A chamois-yellow powder, obtained by heating uranic nitrate in a glass tube to 250° . It dissolves in acids forming the uranic salts.

Chem.: UO_2Cl_2 . Uranyl chloride. Obtained as an orange-yellow vapor, which solidifies to a yellow crystalline mass, when dry chlorine gas is passed over red-hot uranic oxide. It is soluble in water, and forms double salts with the chlorides of the alkali metals.

ūr-a-nī'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. urani(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: Pages; a family of Lepidoptera, now believed to be Hawk Moths, but constituting the transition to the tribe of Butterflies with which they were formerly placed. They are large, have long slender antennæ, and fly by day. Found in the hotter parts of the world. American species are brighter in color than those from the East Indies.

ūr-a-nīn, ūr-a-nīn'-īte, s. [Eng. uran(ium); suff. -in, -inite (Min.); Ger. uranerz, schweruranerz; Fr. urane oxydulé.]

Min.: A mineral crystallizing in the isometric or cubic system, mostly, however, occurring massive. Hardness, 5.5; specific gravity, 6.4-8; luster, greasy to dull; color, velvet-black, grayish; streak, brownish-black to dark olive-green; opaque; fracture, somewhat conchoidal. Composition: Protoxide of uranium, 32.1; sesquioxide of uranium, 67.9 = 100, which is equivalent to the formula $\text{UO}_2\text{U}_2\text{O}_3$. Occurs sparingly in Cornwall, Bohemia, Saxony, and a few other localities.

ūr-a-nīs-cō-nī'-tīs, subst. [Gr. ouraniskos=the palate; suff. -itis.]

Pathol.: Inflammation of the palate.

ūr-a-nīs-cō-plās-tỹ, s. [Gr. ouraniskos = the palate; plastikos = forming, from plassō = to form, to mold.]

Surgery.: The operation of engrafting in case of deficiency of the soft palate.

ūr-a-nīs-cōr'-a-phỹ, s. [Gr. ouraniskos = the palate, and rhapē=a suture.]

Surg.: The operation of suture in the case of cleft palate.

ūr'-an-īte, s. [Eng. uran(ium); suff. -ite (Min.); Fr. urane oxydé; Ger. uranit, uranglimmer.]

Mineralogy:

1. A tetragonal mineral occurring in square tables or plates with beveled edges, occasionally in square octahedrons; cleavage, basal, micaceous. Hardness, 2-2.5; specific gravity, 3.4-3.6; luster of cleavage faces, pearly, of others, sub-resinous; color and streak, various shades of green; transparent to subtranslucent. Composition: A hydrated phosphate of the sesquioxide of uranium and protoxide of copper. The finest varieties of this mineral have been hitherto found in the mines of Cornwall.

2. The same as AUTUNITE (q. v.).

ūr-ān-īt'-īc, a. [Eng. uranit(e); -ic.] Pertaining to or containing uranite.

ū-rān'-ī-ūm, s. [Named by the discoverer after the planet Uranus (q. v.).]

Chem.: A hexad metallic element, discovered by Klaproth in 1789 as a metallic oxide, but first obtained as a true metal by Peligot in 1840; symbol U; atomic weight 120. It is found in pitchblende, which is an oxide, and in uranite, which is a phosphate. The metal is readily obtained by decomposing the chloride with potassium or sodium. It is somewhat malleable and hard, with a color resembling nickel or iron; specific gravity, 18.4; permanent in the air at ordinary temperature, but in the pulverulent state it takes fire at about 207° , burning with great splendor. It forms two classes of compounds, viz., the uranous, in which it is quadrivalent, and the uranic, in which it is sexvalent.

uranium-carbonate, s. [LIEBIGITE, VOGLITE].

uranium-oxide, s. [URANIN, URANINITE.]

uranium-phosphate, s. [URANITE, AUTUNITE.]
uranium-sulphate, subst. [JOHANNITE, URAN-OCHALCITE, MEDJIDITE, ZIPPEITE, VOGLIANITE, URACONITE.]

ūr-a-nō-, pref. [URANIUM, URANUS.]

1. Of or belonging to the sky.

2. Pertaining to or obtained from uranium (q. v.).

ū-rān-ō-chāl'-qīte, s. [Pref. urano-, 2.; Greek chalkos=brass, copper, and suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. uranochalzit.]

Min.: A name given to a mineral occurring in small velvety nodules formed of radiating crystal-fibers. Hardness, 2-2.5; color and streak, grass to apple-green. Composition: Probably sulphuric acid, 21.1; oxide of uranium, 33.5; oxide of copper, 7.0; lime, 9.8; water, 28.5=99.9.

ūr-ān-ō'-chēr, ūr-ān-ō'-chre (chre as kēr), s. [Pref. uran(o)-, 2., and Eng. ocher.]

Min.: The same as URACONITE (q. v.).

ū-rān-ō'-cīr'-qīte, s. [Pref. urano-, 2.; Lat. circus=a circle, and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral strongly resembling autunite (q. v.), for which it had been long mistaken. Specific gravity, 3.53; color, yellowish-green. Composition: Phosphoric acid, 14.0; sesquioxide of uranium, 56.75; baryta, 15.07; water, 14.18=100, thus being an autunite (q. v.), in which baryta replaces the lime. Found in veins in the granite of Saxon Voigtland.

ū-rān-ō-grāph'-īc, ū-rān-ō-grāph'-īc-al, adj. [Eng. uranograph(y); -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to uranography (q. v.).

ūr-an-ōg'-ra-phīst, s. [Eng. uranograph(y); -ist.] One who is versed or skilled in uranography.

ūr-an-ōg'-ra-phỹ, s. [Pref. urano-, 1., and Gr. graphō=to write, to describe.] A description, chart, or orrery of the heavens; that branch of astronomy which consists in the determination of the relative situations of the heavenly bodies and the construction of celestial maps and globes, &c.

ū-rān'-ō-lite, s. [Pref. urano-, 1., and Gr. lithos=a stone.] A meteoric stone; an aërolite.

ūr-an-ōl'-ō-gỹ, s. [Pref. urano-, 1., and Greek logos=a discourse.] The knowledge of the heavens.

ūr-an-ōm'-ēt-rỹ, s. [Pref. urano-, 1., and Gr. metron=a measure.] A measurement of the heavens.

ū-rān-ō-nī'-ō-bīte, s. [Pref. urano-, 2., and Eng. niobite.]

Mineralogy:

1. The same as SAMARSKITE (q. v.).

2. The same as URANIN (q. v.).

ū-rān'-ō-phāne, s. [Pref. urano-, 2., and Greek phainō=to cause to appear.]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral occurring in exceedingly minute crystals on the sides of fissures in granite at Kupferberg, Silesia. Hardness, 2.5-3; specific gravity, 2.6-2.8; color, honey-yellow. Composition: Essentially a hydrated silicate of sesquioxide of uranium, alumina, and lime.

ū-rān-ō-phỹll'-īte, s. [Pref. urano-, 2., and Eng. phyllite.]

Min.: The same as URANITE (q. v.).

ū-rān-ō-scō-pī'-na, s. pl. [Mod. Latin uranoscop(us); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A group of Trachinidæ, containing several genera. The eyes are on the upper surface of the head, directed upward; lateral line continuous.

ūr-a-nōs'-cō-pūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. ouranoskopos=Uranoscopus scaber. (See def.)]

Ichthy.: Stargazer. A genus of Uranoscopina (q. v.), with eleven species from the Indo-Pacific and Atlantic, and one, Uranoscopus scaber, known to the ancients, from the Mediterranean. Head large, broad and thick, partially covered with bony plates; mouth-cleft vertical; scales very small;

two dorsal fins, ventrals jugular, pectorals branched; villiform teeth in jaws, on vomer, and palatine bones; a long filament usually present before and below the tongue; gill-cover armed. The eyes which are very small, can be raised or depressed at will. The species are small, inactive fishes, rarely a foot long, generally lying hidden at the bottom between stones watching for their prey. The filament attached to the bottom of their mouth, and playing in the current of water passing through the mouth, serves to allure small marine animals within their reach.

ūr-an-ōs'-cō-pỹ, subst. [Pref. urano-, 1., and Gr. skopeō=to see, to observe.] Contemplation of the heavenly bodies.

ūr-a-nō-sō-, pref. [Mod. Lat. uranosus=uranous (q. v.).]

Chem.: Uranous (q. v.).

uranoso-uranic oxide, s.

Chem.: $\text{U}_3\text{O}_8 = \text{UO}_2 \cdot 2\text{UO}_3$. The chief constituent of pitchblende, obtained artificially by igniting uranous oxide in contact with air. It forms a dark-green, velvety powder; specific gravity, 7.1-7.3, hardly acted upon by dilute acids, but dissolving without alteration in concentrated hydrochloric and sulphuric acids.

ū-rān-ō-sphær'-īte (ær as èr), s. [Pref. urano-, 2., and Eng. sphærite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in semi-globular groups of microscopic crystals, with radiated and concentric structure. Hardness, 2-3; specific gravity, 6.36; color, orange-yellow to brick-red; luster, greasy. An analysis of perfectly pure material yielded: Sesquioxide of uranium, 50.88; teroxide of bismuth, 44.34; water, 4.75=99.97, which gives the formula $\text{BiO}_2 \cdot 2\text{U}_2\text{O}_3 + 3\text{H}_2\text{O}$. Found at the Weisser Hirsch Mine, Schneeberg, Saxony.

ū-rān-ō-spīn'-īte, s. [Pref. urano-, 2.; Latin spina=a thorn, and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in scales with rectangular contours. Crystallization orthorhombic; hardness, 2-3; specific gravity, 3.45; color, siskin-green. An analysis by Winkler gave: Arsenic acid, 19.37; sesquioxide of uranium, 59.18; lime, 5.47; water, 16.29=100.31, which is approximately equivalent to the formula $\text{CaO} \cdot \text{U}_2\text{O}_3 \cdot \text{AsO}_5 + 8\text{H}_2\text{O}$. Found at the Weisser Hirsch Mine, Schneeberg, Saxony.

ū-rān-ō-tān'-tal-īte, s. [Pref. urano-, 2., and Eng. tantalite; Ger. uranotantal.]

Min.: The same as SAMARSKITE (q. v.).

ū-rān-ō-thāll'-īte, s. [Pref. urano-, 2., and Eng. thallite.]

Min.: A mineral occurring in aggregates of minute crystals or grains as encrustations on uranium ores. Hardness, 2.5-3.0; color, and streak, siskin-green; luster, vitreous, on cleavage faces pearly. Composition: A hydrated carbonate of uranium and lime. Found at Joachimsthal, Bohemia.

ū-rān-ō-thōr'-īte, s. [Pref. urano-, 2., and Eng. thorite.]

Mineral.: A variety of thorite (q. v.), containing nearly 10 per cent. of sesquioxide of uranium. Found in the Champlain iron region, New York.

ū-rān'-ō-tīl, s. [URANIUM.]

Mineral.: An orthorhombic mineral occurring in radiating or stellar groups of acicular crystals. Specific gravity, 3.95; color, lemon-yellow. The mean of three analyses gave: Silica, 13.78; sesquioxide of uranium, 66.75; alumina and sesquioxide of iron, 0.51; lime, 5.27; phosphoric acid, 0.45; water, 12.67=99.43, which resembles the composition of uranophane (q. v.).

ūr'-a-noūs, a. [Eng. uran(ium); -ous.] Derived from uranium.

Chem.: UCl_4 . Formed by burning uranium in chlorine gas, or by igniting uranous oxide in hydrochloric acid gas. It crystallizes in dark-green deliquescent octahedrons, soluble in water with a hissing noise, forming an emerald-green solution. When boiled it gives off hydrochloric acid, and deposits a finely-divided brown powder.

Chemistry: UO_2 . Obtained by heating uranoso-uranic oxide in a current of hydrogen. It is a brown crystalline powder, soluble in acids, and forming greenish-colored salts.

Ūr'-a-nūs, s. [Mod. Latin, from Greek ouranos=heaven; spec., the celestial vault.]

1. Greek Mythology: The most ancient of all the gods. He married Terra, or Earth, by whom he had, first, the children called the hundred-handed, Briareus, Cottus, and Gyges; secondly, the Cyclopes, Arges, Steropes, and Brontes; thirdly, the Titans, Oceanus, Cœus, Saturnus, &c.; and lastly, the Giants. He was dethroned and mutilated by his son Saturnus, and from his blood sprang the Furies, Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megæra.

2. Astron.: One of the superior planets between Saturn and Neptune. It was not known to the ancients. When Sir William Herschel, after the construction of his great reflecting telescope [TELESCOPE] was systematically examining with it all the stars above a certain magnitude, he, on March 13, 1781, found in the constellation Gemini a star which he recognized as having a disk which the others had not. He took it for a comet, and other contemporary astronomers held the same view. Some months afterward, as its motions were traced, the opinion arose that it was a planet, and in January, 1783, La Place laid before the Academy of Science, at Paris, calculations relating to its elliptic orbit which established beyond a doubt that this opinion was correct. The discovery led to the appointment of Herschel as British Astronomer-Royal, and the establishment of the observatory at Slough, in Buckingham County, England. Uranus had been noted down by Flamsteed as a fixed star, in his Historia Cælestis Britannica, published in 1725, and he had measured its place four or five times between 1690 and 1715. Lemonnier had observed it nine times without identifying it as a planet. Bradley and Tobias Mayer had done so at least once. Its diameter is about 31,700 miles—about four times that of the earth, its bulk about sixty-four times as great; but being of light material its weight is only fifteen times as great. It has been reasoned out from analogy rather than proved by actual observation that it rotates, but the time of this rotation is wholly unknown. Its distance from the sun is about 1,800,000,000 miles, and it travels once round the orbit in about eighty-seven years. It receives only about one three-thousandth part of the light and heat from the sun which fall upon the earth. It is attended by at least four satellites—Ariel, Umbriel, Titania, and Oberon. Their orbits all lie in the same plane, and are at right angles to the path of the planet itself—a circumstance not known in the case of any other planet. Called also Georgium Sidus and Herschel (q. v.).

û-ra'-rî, s. [CURARI.]

u-râr'-i-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. oura=a tail, which the bracts resemble.]

Bot.: A genus of Hedysarææ. Papilionaceous plants with pinnate leaves, having generally three leaflets, purple or yellow flowers, and nearly sessile legumes contracted between the seeds. Uraría lagopoides, an Indian species, is considered by the Hindus to be alterative, tonic, and anticatarrhal, and is an ingredient in some of their medicines. The fruit of U. picta, another Indian species, is applied to the sore mouths of children, and the plant itself is deemed an antidote for the bite of a Southern Indian snake (Echis carinata).

u-räs'-têr, s. [Pref. ur(o)., and Gr. astêr=a star-fish.]

Zoölogy.: A synonym of Asterias (q. v.). [STAR-FISH.]

u-räs-têr-êl'-lâ, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from uraster (q. v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of Star-fishes, having the ambulacral grooves margined by a row of ambulacral plates only. Found in the Silurian. Called also Stenaster.

ûr'-ate, s. [Eng. ur(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of uric acid.

urate of ammonia, s.

Chem.: $C_5H_3(NH_4)_4N_4O_3$. A salt frequently found in urine, and prepared by adding ammonia to uric acid. It is slightly soluble in water, insoluble in alcohol and ether.

ûr'-ban, a. [Lat. urbanus=pertaining to a city; urbs (genit. urbis)=a city.]

1. Of or pertaining to a city or town; living or situated in a city or town.

"The gradual removal of urban rookeries."—London Daily Telegraph.

*2. Urbane (q. v.).

ûr-bâne', adj. [Latin urbanus=urban (q. v.).] Courteous, polite, suave, elegant, refined, polished.

"Raising, through just gradation, savage life

To rustic, and the rustic to urbane."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. viii.

Ûr'-ban-ist, s. [See def. II. 1, 2.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A sort of dessert pear of the highest excellence.

II. Church History (pl.):

1. A name sometimes given to those of the Poor Clares (q. v.) who accepted the reform of Pope Urban IV. (1291-65).

2. The adherents of Pope Urban VI. (1378-89), in opposition to whom Clement VII. was afterward elected. The latter held his court at Fondi, in the kingdom of Naples, and afterward at Avignon.

"As Clement's party drew back, the Urbanists took up the cry."—Milman: Latin Christianity, viii. 51.

ûr-băn'-i-tÿ, *ur-ban-i-tie, s. [Fr. urbanité, from Lat. urbanitatem, accus. of urbanitas, from urbanus=urbane (q. v.).]

1. The quality or state of being urbane; civility and courteousness of manner; refinement, suavity, polish, politeness.

"The grace and urbanity of his manners."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

*2. A polished humor or facetiousness.

"Moral doctrine, and urbanity [says Casaubon] or well-mannered wit, are the two things which constitute the Roman satire."—Dryden: Juvenal. (Dedic.)

ûr'-ban-ize, v. t. [English urban(e); -ize.] To render urbane.

"Refined nations, whom nature and knowledge did first urbanize and polish."—Howell: Instructions for Travel, p. 9. (1642.)

ûr-bîc'-ô-loûs, a. [Lat. urbs (genit. urbis)=a city, a town, and colo=to cultivate, to inhabit.] Inhabiting a city or town; urban. (Eccl. Rev., in Annandale.)

ûr-qê'-ô-lâ, s. [Lat. urceolus (q. v.).]

1. Bot.: A genus of Plumierææ. Named from the form of the corolla. Leaves opposite, ovato-oblong; flowers small, greenish, in terminal cymes; calyx five-cleft; corolla pitcher-shaped, hairy, with five erect teeth; stamens five, with sagittate anthers; ovaries two, developing into fruit the size of oranges. Urceola elastica of Roxburgh (= U. esculenta of Benth) is an extensive woody climber in the forests of Tenasserim and Pegu. Mr. G. W. Stretell believes that it may be utilized for supplying caoutchouc. (Calcutta Exhib. Report.)

2. Eccl. Hist.: A pitcher for containing water for ritual use in the Eucharistic service, whether for washing the ministrant's hands or for cleansing the vessels. (Smith: Christian Antiquities.)

ûr-qê'-ô-lâr'-i-a, s. [Lat. urceolaris=of or belonging to a small pitcher.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Limboridæ, closely akin to Lecanora, and named from the form of the shields. The spermogonia are scattered over the thallus, sometimes on the border of the apothecia. They are inconspicuous on account of their pale color. Urceolaria scruposa and U. cinerea are Crustaceans Lichens, used in dyeing. The former is the more common, growing on heaths, walls, and rocks.

2. Zoöl.: A genus of Urceolariidæ (q. v.), with a single species, parasitic on Planaria torva. Free-swimming, highly elastic, changeable in shape; sucking-disc provided with a simply striated horny ring; the anterior region usually alternate, and with the peristome obliquely set.

ûr-qê'-ô-lâ-rî'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin urceolari(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Peritrichous Infusoria, with four genera, from salt and fresh water; all parasitic or commensal. Animalcules free-swimming or adherent at will, discoidal, turbinate, or hourglass-shaped; anterior border more or less circular, with a spirally convolute ciliary wreath, the right limb of which descends into the oral aperture; oral system consisting usually of a widened anterior entrance (the vestibulum), and a somewhat prolonged pharyngeal passage; posterior border cup-shaped, adhesive, ciliated, and generally strengthened internally with a horny ring, which in some cases is simple, and in others set with tooth-like processes.

ûr-qê'-ô-lâ-te, a. [Mod. Latin urceolatus, from Lat. urceolus (q. v.).]

Bot.: Pitcher-shaped (q. v.).

ûr-qê'-ô-lûs, s. [Latin, dimin. from urceus=a water-pitcher.]

Bot. (of a carex): The tube made by two bracts, which becoming confluent at their edges, enclose the pistil. Called also Perigynium.

ûr'-ghîn, ûr'-chôn, ur-chone, ir-chon, ur-gîn, yrç-heon, s. & a. [O. Fr. ireçon, heriçon, ericon; Fr. hérisson=a hedgehog, as if from a Lat. ericionem, accus. of ericio, for ericius=a hedgehog; cogn. with Gr. chêr=a hedgehog.]

*A. As substantive:

*I. Ordinary Language:

1. A name given to the hedgehog.

"Round as a ball, skinned like an yrcheon or hedgehog."—Holinshead: Descript. Scotland, ch. ix.

2. A sea-urchin (q. v.).

"The urchins of the sea called echini."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. ix, ch. xxxi.

*3. An elf, a fairy, from its being supposed to take at times the shape of a hedgehog.

"Like urchins, ouphes and fairies."

Shakesp.: Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 4.

4. A familiar, half chiding name sometimes given to a child.

"There stood the urchin as you will divine."

Wordsworth: Michael.

II. Technically:

1. Botany: The key of the ash-tree. (Halliwell.) More probably the fruit of the horse-chestnut, Æsculus hippocastanum. (Britten & Holland.)

2. Carding: One of a pair of rapidly revolving small card-cylinders, arranged around the periphery of a large card drum.

B. As adjective:

1. Prickly, stinging, rough. (Milton.)

2. Trumpery.

"How easie it was to stride over such urchin articles."—Hacket: Life of Williams, ii. 91.

ûr'-chôn, ur-chone, s. [URCHIN.]

ûr'-deë, ûr-dÿ, a. [Fr. urdée.]

Her.: Pointed. A cross-urdée is one in which the extremities are drawn to a sharp point instead of being cut straight.

ûrd'-ite, s. [After Urdæ, of Scandinavian mythology; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given by D. Forbes to a monazite occurring in large crystals in the granite of Noterö, near Arendal, Norway.

Cross Urdée.

ûr'-dû, s. & a. [Hind. urdu=(1) an army, a camp, a market, (2) the language defined in the article.]

A. As subst.: The Hindustani language, as spoken by the Mohammedan population of India. It is a lingua franca, which became the medium of communication between the Mohammedan conquerors of India and their Hindu subjects. It is really the Hindi language, which is of the Aryan family, with a number of Persian, Arabic, and Turkish words introduced into it, though the inflections of nouns and verbs remain unaltered. Many consider Urdu a distinct language from Hindi, but Beames regards this as a great error in philology. It is now the language most largely used by Europeans in their intercourse with the natives of India. It has a literature, chiefly historic, which arose under the Mogul emperors, commencing with Akbar (1556-1605).

"By a curious caprice Hindi, when it uses Arabic words, is assumed to become a new language, and is called by a new name—Urdu; but when Punjabi or Sindhi do the same, they are not so treated."—Beames: Comp. Gram. Aryan Lang., i. 39.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to the language so called.

ûre (1), s. [O. Fr. euve, euve; Fr. œuvre=work. Cf. manure, inure.] Use, practice.

"For in the time that thieving was in ure,

The gentler fled to places more secure."

John Taylor: Penniless Pilgrimage.

ûre (2), s. [O. Fr. êur=lot, chance, from Lat. augurium=augury (q. v.).] Chance, destiny, fortune.

"So pitously gan cry

On his fortune and on ure also."

Lydgate: Complaint of the Black Knight.

ûre (3), s. [URUS.] A wild bull; the urus.

"The third kind is of them that are named ures."—Goldinge: Cæsar, fol. 163.

ûre, v. t. [URE (1), s.] To inure; to accustom by use or practice.

ûr'-ê-a, s. [Latinized from root of urina=urine (q. v.).]

Chem.: $CH_4N_2O=C=O$. The chief organic constituent of urine, first obtained in an impure state by Rouelle the younger, in 1799. It is readily obtained by evaporating urine to dryness on the water-bath and exhausting the residue with alcohol; or it may be prepared synthetically by the action of ammonia upon carbonic oxychloride.

From a pure aqueous solution it crystallizes in long, flattened prisms without terminal faces, is soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether, melts at 120°, and decomposes at a higher temperature. The synthesis of urea, discovered by Wöhler in 1828, was the first instance of an undoubtedly organic body being obtained by artificial means.

ûred, a. [URE (2), s.] Fortunate.

"In my body I was well ured."—Chaucer: Dream.

ūr-ě-dīn-ā-čě-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. uredo (q. v.), gen. uredin(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]
Bot.: The same as CONTOMYCETES (q. v.). (Lindley.)

ūr-ě-dīn-ě-l, subst. pl. [Lat. uredo, genit. uredin(is); Lat. masc. pl. adj. suff. -ei.]
Bot.: A section of Pucciniæ. Protospores not septate, and disposed in regular sori, or the species have two kinds of fruit. Some alleged species are undoubtedly only the secondary state of other Fungals, but there are Uredinei which appear genuine. All were formerly included under Uredo (q. v.).

ū-rě-dō, s. [Lat. = a blast or blight of plants; uro = to burn.]
Bot.: The typical genus of Uredinei (q. v.). Protospores brown or yellow, composed of several layers of cells, each containing a spore. Uredo circææ is found on Enchanter's Nightshade, and U. confluens on Mercurialis perennis.

ūr-ě-ide, s. [Eng. ure(a); -ide]

Chem. (pl.): Compounds containing the elements of a urea-salt, minus water; thus alloxan is a monuride of mesoxalic acid, being a compound of that acid with one atom of urea minus 2H₂O.

ū-rě-na, s. [From uren, the Malabar name of the species defined.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Urenæ (q. v.). Involucre and calyx five-cleft; style divided above into ten portions; carpels five, prickly at the top. Urena lobata, a shrub commonly occurring with the mango and bamboo in Bengal and throughout India, and U. sinuata, a small Indian shrub, have strong fibers, probably well adapted for the manufacture of sacking and twine. (Calcutta Exhib. Report.) In Brazil a decoction of the root and stem of U. lobata is employed as a remedy in windy colic, and the flowers are given as an expectorant in dry and inveterate cough.

ūr-ět, s. [UREA.]

Chem.: This name has been applied to the group CH₂NO, which by substitution for one atom of hydrogen in ammonia, may be supposed to form urea, CH₂NO } N, and by substitution for two atoms of hydrogen, biuret, (CH₂NO)₂ } N. (Watts.)

¶ This term was formerly used as an affix indicative of combination; thus sulphuret now sulphide; phosphuret, phosphide, &c.

ū-rě-těr, s. [Gr. ourēter = the urethra, and oureō = to pass urine.]

Anat. (pl.): Two tubes which conduct the urine from the kidneys into the bladder, one entering at each side near the base. They are from fourteen to sixteen inches long, and about the width of a goose quill.

ū-rě-těr-l-tis, subst. [Eng. ureter; snff. -itis.]
 Inflammation of the ureter.

ūr-ě-thāneš, s. pl. [Eng. ur(ic), and ethane.]
 [CARBAMIC-ETHERS.]

ū-rě-thra, s. [Gr. ourēthra.]
Anat.: A membranous tube running from the bladder first directly downward and then forward beneath the arch of the pubes. It is the excretory passage for the urine, serving also in the male for the ejaculation of the semen.

ū-rě-thra-l, a. [Eng. urethra(a); suff. -al.] Of or belonging to the urethra; as, urethral abscess.

ū-rě-thra-tōme, s. [Mod. Lat. urethra, and Gr. tomē = a cutting.] Surg.: A knife used in urethrotomy (q. v.).

ūr-ě-thrī-tis, s. [English urethr(a); suff. -itis (q. v.).]
Pathol.: Inflammation of the mucous membrane lining the urethra [GONORRHOEA], or of the urethra itself.

ū-rě-thrō-plas-tic, a. [Eng. urethroplast(y); -ic.]
Surg.: Of or relating to urethroplasty.

ū-rě-thrō-plas-tý, s. [Gr. ourēthra = the urethra, and plassō = to mold.]
Surg.: An operation for remedying defects in the urethra.

ūr-ě-thrōt-ō-mý, s. [URETHRATOME.]
Surg.: The operation for urethral stricture.

ūr-ě-thýl-āne, s. [Eng. ur(ic); ethyl, and suff. -ane.] [METHYLIC-CARBAMATE.]

A. Transitive:

1. To force or drive onward.

*2. To hasten or push forward with exertion and vigor.

"Now urge the course where swift Scamander glides."
Pope: Homer's Iliad xxi. 714.

3. To press the mind or will of; to serve as a motive or impelling cause; to impel, to constrain, to stimulate.

4. To press or ply hard with arguments, entreaties, or the like; to importune, to solicit with more or less earnestness.

"And he urged him to take it."—2 Kings v. 16.

5. To press upon attention; to put forward or advance in an earnest manner; to press by way of argument; to plead earnestly; to insist on.

"These arguments . . . were doubtless urged with force by Danby."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. x.

*6. To press closely on; to follow closely.

"Heir urges heir, like wave impelling wave."
Pope: Satires, vi. 253.

*7. To ply hard in a contest or argument; to attack briskly.

"Though every man have a right in dispute to urge a false religion."—Tillotson

*8. To demand; to insist on.

"She urged conference."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, i. 2.

*9. To incite, to stimulate, to promote, to encourage.

"Urging the carnage, and eyeing with pleasure all the horrors of war."—London Daily Telegraph.

*10. To provoke, to irritate, to exasperate.

"I'll in, to urge his hatred more to Clarence."
Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 1.

B. Intransitive:

*1. To press onward.

"He Strives to urge upward, and his fortune raise," Donne. (Todd.)

2. To incite; to stimulate.

"The combat urges, and my soul's on fire."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, vi. 453.

3. To make a claim; to insist, to persist.

"Urg'd extremely for it."—Shakesp.: Timon, iii. 2.

4. To produce arguments; to allege proofs, as an accuser.

"That . . . my accusers
 May stand forth face to face
 And freely urge against me," Shakesp.: Henry VIII., v. 3.

ūrge, s. [Fr. orge = barley.] Barley.

ūrge-wonder, s. A variety of barley.

"This barley is called by some urge-wonder."—Mortimer.

ūrg-ençe, subst. [Lat. urgens = urgent (q. v.)] Urgency.

"His business craves dispatch,
 And is of serious urgency."
New Tricks to Cheate the Devil.

ūrg-en-čý, s. [Eng. urgen(t); -cy.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The quality or state of being urgent; as—

1. Importunity; earnest solicitation or pressing.

"At length he yielded to the urgency of friends."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. x.

2. Pressure of necessity.

"Saving only in case of so great urgency."—Hooker: Eccles. Politie, bk. i. § 8.

II. In the British Parliament: The voting by a majority of three to one in a house of not less than three hundred members, that a certain measure or resolution is urgent in the interests of the state, in which case it takes precedence of all other business, corresponding to the American emergency vote.

ūrg-ent, a. [Fr. from Lat. urgens, pr. par. of urgeo = to urge (q. v.).]

*1. Oppressive.

"The heat is very urgent."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 49.

2. Pressing, cogent; necessitating immediate action; demanding early attention.

"He will send to borrow so much money, pretending urgent occasions for it."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1686).

3. Pressing or soliciting with importunity; importunate.

"The Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out in haste."—Exodus xii. 33.

ūrg-ent-lý, ūrg-ente-lý, adv. [Eng. urgent; -ly.] In an urgent manner; with pressing importunity; pressing, forcibly.

"And therefore the Jewes called more urgently upon the matter."—Udall: John xix.

ūrg-ēr, s. [Eng. urg(e); -er.] One who urges; one who importunes; an inciter.

"Few . . . admonishers, but urgers of your action."
Beaum. & Flet.: Valentinian, i. 3.

ūr-gīn'-e-a, s. [Named by Steinheil, in 1834, after Ben Urgan, a tribe of Arabs near Bona, Algeria, in whose territory he first collected a species of the genus.]

Bot.: A genus of Scilleæ, akin to Scilla, but with a more spreading perianth and more numerous seeds. Urginea maritima (U. Scilla or Scilla maritima) is the Squill (q. v.). U. indica, found on the sandy shores of India, is sometimes given as a substitute for the officinal squill, to which, however, it is much inferior in value. It is chiefly used, according to Dr. Ainslie, for horses in cases of strangury and fever.

ūr-i-a, s. [Lat. urinor = to dive.]

Ornith.: Guillemot; a genus of Alcidæ, with eight species, from the Arctic and north temperate zones. Bill of moderate length, strong, straight, pointed, compressed, upper mandible slightly curved near the point, with a small notch in the edge on each side; nostrils lateral, basal, concave, pierced longitudinally, partly closed by a membrane, which is itself partly covered with feathers; feet short, placed behind the center of gravity in the body; legs slender; feet with only three toes, all in front and entirely webbed; wings and tail short.

ūr-ic, a. [Eng. ur(ea); -ic.] Contained in or derived from urea (q. v.).

Chem.: C₅H₄N₄O₃. Formerly called lithic acid. A general constituent of the Vertebrata, and usually prepared from serpents' excrements or from guano, by boiling with dilute potassic hydrate, and decomposing by hydrochloric acid. It forms a glistening, snow-white spongy crystalline powder, tasteless and inodorous, slightly soluble in water, insoluble in alcohol and ether. By destructive distillation it yields cyanic and hydrocyanic acids, carbon dioxide, and ammonium carbonate. It is readily identified, even in minute quantity, and by dissolving in nitric acid, evaporating the solution to dryness, and adding excess of ammonia, a beautiful deep red color (murexide) is immediately produced. It forms salts called urates.

ūr-im, s. pl. [Heb. urim, pl. of ur, the same as or = light.]

Hebrew Antiq.: Literally, lights; but the Septuagint translators make it apparently a plural of excellence, in which case it would signify, light. Used specially in the compound term Urim and Thummim [THUMMIM], believed to mean, light and perfection. Many conjectures have been hazarded as to their nature, but the subject still remains very obscure. They were to be put "on the breastplate of judgment," and on or over the heart of the high priest when he specially entered into the presence of Jehovah (Exod. xxviii. 30; Lev. viii. 8). On the return from the captivity the Tirshatha (governor) forbade certain sacerdotal pretenders, or perhaps the whole body of Aaron's descendants (for the words seem ambiguous), to eat of the most holy things till there should stand up "a priest with Urim and with Thummim" (Ezra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65). In one place the order of the two words is reversed (Deut. xxxiii. 8). If by Urim in two other passages is meant Urim and Thummim, then they seem to have constituted an oracle to or by which applications might be made to Jehovah for counsel (Numb. xxvii. 21; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6).

ūr-in-āl, s. [Fr., from urine = urine (q. v.).]

1. A vessel for containing urine, specifically a vessel or reservoir, with conductor, used in cases of incontinence of urine.

"Eke thyn urinals and thy jordanes."

Chaucer: C. T., 12,240.

2. A convenience, public or private, for the accommodation of persons wishing to pass urine.

3. A bottle in which urine was kept for inspection.

"These follies shine through you like the water in an urinal."—Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, ii. 1.

ūr-in-āl-ist, s. [Eng. urinal; -ist.] One who professed to be able, by inspecting the urine, to discover from what disease a sick person was suffering.

"My urinalist . . . left no artery Unstretched upon the tenters."

Decker: Match Me in London, iii.

ūr-in-ant, a. [Lat. urinans, pr. par. of urinor = to duck or dive under water.]

Her.: A term applied to the dolphin, or other fish, when borne with the head downward, and the tail erect, exactly in a contrary position to what is termed Haurient.

ūr-in-ar-ý, a. & s. [Eng. urin(e); -ary.]

A. As adj. Of, pertaining to, containing, deposited from, or affording passage to urine: as, urinary calculi, urinary deposits, the urinary passage.

ból, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
 -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhñ; -tion, -sion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

B. As substantive:

1. Agric.: A reservoir or place for the reception of urine, &c., for manure.

*2. The same as URINAL, 2.

urinary-bladder, s.

Anat.: A hollow membranous and muscular receptacle receiving the urine poured into it through the ureter, retaining it for a longer or shorter period, and finally expelling it through the urethra. In the male it is situated in front of the rectum; in the female it is separated from the rectum by the uterus and the vagina. When completely distended with urine, it rises above the brim of the pelvis and becomes egg-shaped, the larger end constituting its base, or inferior fundus, and being directed toward the rectum in the male and the vagina in the female, and its smaller end, or summit, resting against the wall of the abdomen. In front of the base is the cervix or neck connecting the bladder below with the urethra.

urinary-fistula, s.

Pathol.: An abnormal communication between the urinary passages and the external surface, through which the urine finds an outlet in greater or less quantities.

urinary-organs, s. pl.

Anat.: A collective term, including (1) the kidneys which secrete urine; (2) the ureters which convey it to (3) the bladder; and (4) the urethra, by which it is evacuated from the body.

urinary-vesicle, s.

Anat.: A term sometimes applied to the allantois, (q. v.) because from a dilation on its pedicle the mammalian bladder is produced.

ür'-in-äte, v. i. [URINE.] To discharge urine.

ür'-in-ä'-tion, s. [URINATE.] The act of passing urine; micturition.

ür'-in-ät-ive, a. [Eng. urin(e); -ative.] Provoking or promoting the discharge of urine; diuretic.

ür'-in-ät-ör, s. [Low Lat. from urinatus, pa. par. of urino=to dive or duck under water.] A diver; one who searches underwater for something, as for pearls.

"The precious things that grow there, as pearl, may be much more easily fetched up by the help of this, than by any other way of the urinators."—Wilkins: Mathematical Magick.

ür'-ine, s. [Fr., from Lat. urina=urine; cogn. with Gr. ouron=urine; Sans. vāri, vār=water; Icel. úr=drizzling rain; ver=the sea; A. S. wer=the sea.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Chem.: The secretion of the kidneys, the chief fluid excretion of man and of the higher animals. (Watts.) Healthy human urine is a transparent light amber-colored liquid, having a saline taste, a peculiar aromatic odor, an acid reaction, and a density varying from 1.010 to 1.025. Its chief constituents are urea, uric, lactic and hippuric acids, and creatine, together with calcium and magnesium sulphates, chlorides and phosphates, alkaline salts, certain imperfectly known principles, and a coloring substance. The urine contains the liquid portion of useless and noxious residuum left after the assimilation of whatever is useful to the structure. [URÆMIA.]

2. Pathol.: Morbid states of the urine occur—the aqueous, the subaqueous, the lithic, the phosphatic, the purpuric, the albuminous, and the saccharine. Aqueous urine, with a diminution in its solid contents, is passed in large quantity by nervous and hysteric persons, especially when they approach old age. Subaqueous urine, in some respects the opposite of the first, carries off an unduly large proportion of solid matters, and exists chiefly in decline of the bodily powers, which it tends to accelerate. Lithic urine deposits a pink or purple sand or "gravel," consisting of lithia; its ultimate tendency is to produce lithic calculi. Phosphatic urine contains an excess of phosphatic salts, and deposits a white earthy or chalky powder. Purpuric urine deposits a lateritious sediment. Albuminous urine deposits albumen; sometimes it is an unimportant, but at others a very formidable disease. [ALBUMINURIA.] Saccharine urine is an attendant on diabetes (q. v.).

3. Physiol.: The mechanism by which the urine is secreted is apparently of a double kind: (1) uriniferous tubules, which seem to be actively secreting structures, and (2) the Malpighian capsules, which appear to act rather as a filtering apparatus.

ür'-ine, v. i. [Fr. uriner; Sp. urinar.] To pass urine; to make water. (Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 835.)

ür-in-îf'-ër-ous, adj. [Lat. urina=urine, and fero=to bear.] Bearing or affording passage to urine.

uriniferous-tubes, s. pl.

Anat.: Small tubes or ducts opening on the surface of the several papillæ into the interior of the calices of the kidneys.

ür-in-ip'-ar-ous, adj. [Lat. urina=urine, and pario=to produce.]

Anat. & Physiol.: Producing or secreting urine. Used of certain tubes in the cortical portion of the kidney.

ür-in-ö-gën'-i-tal, a. [UROGENITAL.]

ür-in-öm'-ë-tër, s. [Lat. urina=urine, and Gr. metron=a measure.]

Physics: An instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of urine. It is constructed on the principle of the hydrometer, and variations in the density of urine as detected by it are of great importance in the treatment of disease.

ür'-in-ous, *ür-in-öse, a. [Eng. urin(e); -ous, -ose.] Full of urine, emanating from, impregnated with, or smelling of urine. Used specially of an odor of urine in the breath, the perspiration, or in vomited matter.

"Conveying the urinose particles to the pelvis and ureters."—Ray: On the Creation, pt. ii.

ür'-iths, s. pl. [Etym. doubtful.] The bindings of a hedge.

ürle, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Bot.: The tare (Vicia sativa).

ürn, *urne, s. [Fr. urne, from Lat. urna; prob. from uro=to burn, urns being used for containing the ashes of the dead.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A vessel, enlarged in the middle and provided with a foot or pedestal; specifically, a vessel in which the ashes of the dead were formerly preserved; a cinerary urn. (Browne: Hydriotaphia, ch. iii.) [URN-BURIAL.]

2. A vase or vessel, for holding water; hence, a vessel generally.

"Ten thousand rivers pour'd at his command,
From urns that never fail."

Cowper: Retirement, 73.

3. The same as TEA-URN (q. v.).

4. A ballot-box. (Eng.)

"The Reactionaries broke into the voting hall; . . . flung the traditional 'urn' out of the window."—London Daily Telegraph.

*5. A place of burial; a grave. (Fig.)

"Lay these bones in an unworthy urn."
Shakesp.: Henry V., i. 2.

*6. A Roman measure for liquids, containing about three gallons. One urn was four times the congius and half the amphora.

II. Bot.: The spore-case of any moss belonging to the Bryaceæ. [URNMOSS.]

*[In the urn: Unknown, undiscovered. (A reference to the urn of destiny; cf. Virg. Æn. vi. 432, Hor.: Od. III. i. 16.)

"A large part of the earth is still in the urn to us."—Browne: Hydriotaphia, ch. i.

urn-burial, s.

Anthropology: An expression used by Sir Thomas Browne as a sub-title to his Hydriotaphia, and employed to denote: (1) the deposition of human ashes in a cinerary urn after cremation; (2) less commonly, actual interment of a corpse in an urn. Both methods were practiced by the ancient Greeks, and afterward spread westward. The Grecian pitthos, which resembled in size and shape the large oil-jars of southern Europe, was used as an urn to contain burnt human ashes; and two such jars placed mouth to mouth sometimes served as a rude coffin, and thus arranged they are not unfrequently found in the tombs of the Troad. (Dennis: Cities and Cemeteries of Etruria, vol. i., p. cvii.)

ürn, *urne, v. t. [URN, s.] To inclose in or as in an urn. [INURN.]

"He will not suffer us to burn their bones, To urn their ashes." Two Noble Kinsmen, i. 1.

ürn'-al, a. [Eng. urn; -al.] Pertaining to, resembling, or done by means of an urn; as, urnal interment.

"Urnal interments and burnt relics lie not in fear of worms."—Browne: Hydriotaphia, ch. iii.

ürn'-fûl, s. [Eng. urn, s.; -ful(l).] As much as an urn will hold.

ürn'-moss, s. [Eng. urn, and moss.]

Bot. (pl.): The Bryaceæ. (Lindley.)

ür'-nu-lä, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from urna=an urn (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: A genus of Tentaculifera Suctoria. Animals bearing a single retractile, simple or sparsely-branched, filiform tentaculate appendage; excreting and inhabiting a membranous lorica. They multiply by the production of free-swimming ciliated embryos, and by the sub-division of the entire body mass into sporular elements. There is but one species, Urnulla epistylidis, which lives attached to the branching pedicle of Epistylis plicatilis.

ür-ö-, pref. [Gr. oura=a tail.] Tailed; having a tail or a tail-like process or processes.

ür-ö-ä'-ë-tüs, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. aetos=an eagle.]

Ornith.: A genus of Aquilinæ, with one species from Australia and Tasmania.

ür-ö-çën'-trüm, s. [Pref. uro-, and Lat. centrum=a sharp point.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Peritrichous Infusoria, family Gyroceridæ, with one species, Urocentrum turbo, from salt and fresh water. Free-swimming, ovate or pyriform, persistent; body with one or two circular girdles of cilia; a caudal appendage produced from the posterior region; endoplast and contractile vesicle conspicuously developed.

ür-ö-çër'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. urocer(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: Tailed wasps; a family of Phytophaga. Antennæ filiform, of uniform thickness, having from eleven to twenty-four joints, middle lobe of the mesonotum reaching to the scutellum, and separated from it by a transverse line; abdomen elongated, usually nearly cylindrical, of nine segments; ovipositor long; tibiæ with only a single spine at the apex; larvæ like those of beetles, with six thoracic legs, often rudimentary, and generally no prolegs. The species, which are chiefly from Europe and North America, are not numerous. Called also Siricidæ. [SIREX.]

ü-röç'-ër-üs, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. keras=a horn.]

ür'-ö-chord, subst. [UROCHORDATA.] Any individual of the Urochordata (q. v.).

"Amphioxus has no external skeleton, nor have those Urochords that are tailed through life."—Bell: Comp. Anat., p. 313.

ür-ö-chor-dä'-tä, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. oura=the tail, and chordê=a string, here=the notochord.]

Zoöl.: A name given by some authors to the Tunicata (q. v.). The group is divided into (1) Perennichordata, in which the notochord is found in the tail only, and is retained through life; and (2) Caducichordata, in which the caudal notochord is present in the larva only or is never developed. The notochord, when present, may be regarded as having a distinct locomotory function.

ür-ö-cor'-dÿ-lüs, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. kordylê=a club, a cudgel.]

Palæont.: A genus of Labyrinthodonts. Skull triangular, truncated behind, with a rounded snout; teeth small, slightly curved; ventral armor consisting of scutes in a chevron pattern, reversed behind. From various Coal-measures.

ür-ö-crÿp'-tüs, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. kryptos=hidden.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Bats, now merged in Saccopteryx (q. v.).

ü-röç'-ÿ-ön, s. [Pref. uro-, and Greek kyôn=a dog.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Canidæ, with two species: Urocyon virginianus (the Gray Fox) from North America, and U. littoralis (the Coast Fox) from California. (Gray: Proc. Zoöl. Soc., 1868.)

ür-ö-dē'-lä, s. pl. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. dēlos=visible, manifest.]

1. Zoöl.: A division of Amphibians, often called Tailed Amphibians, from the fact that the larval tail persists in adult life. The skin is naked, and an exoskeleton is rarely present. The body is elongated posteriorly to form a compressed or cylindrical tail; dorsal vertebræ biconcave, or concave behind and convex in front, ribshort and attached to the transverse processes. The radius and ulna in the fore limb, and the tibia and fibula in the hind limb, do not grow together so as to form a single bone. Most of them have the four limbs well developed, but in some the posterior limbs are wanting. The Urodela are divided into two suborders, Salamandrinæ and Ichthyoidæ.

2. Palæont.: From the Permian onward. [SALAMANDER.]

ü-röd'-ë-lan, s. [Mod. Latin urodel(a); Eng. suff. -an.] Any individual of the Urodela (q. v.).

"The former . . . is believed by its discoverer to be a urodelan."—Nicholson: Palæont., ii. 175.

ür'-ö-dēle, a. & s. [URODELA.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the Urodela.

"The world's surface may be divided, according to its Urodele population, into three regions."—Mivart: The Common Frog, p. 49.

B. As substantive: Any individual of the Urodela (q. v.).

"The largest existing Urodele . . . is found in Japan."—Mivart: The Common Frog, p. 42.

ür-ö-gën'-i-tal, ür-in-ö-gën'-i-tal, a. [Formed from Eng. urine, and genital.] Of or belonging to the urine and genital products; chiefly used of the urogenital or urinogenital passage, of which the male urethra is an example.

fāte, fāt, färe, amidst, whāt, fäll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite. cūr, rāle, fūll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

ūr-ō-glē'-nā, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. glēnē=an eyeball.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Flagellata-eustomata, family Chloromonadidae. Animalcules inclosed socially within a sub-spheroidal matrix; flagella two; endoplasm inclosing two distinct lateral color-bands, and usually one or more eye-like pigment-spots. There is one species, Uroglena volvox, from pond water, formerly regarded as an imperfect or transitional form of Volvox (q. v.).

ūr-ō-gým'-nūs, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. gymnos=naked, unarmed.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Trygonidae (q. v.). Tail long, finless and unarmed with spines; body thickly covered with bony tubercles; teeth flattened. Urogymnus asperrimus, about four or five feet long, from the Indian Ocean, is the only species. Its skin is used for covering shields and the handles of swords and other weapons, its rough surface affording a firm grip to the hand.

ūr-ō-lēp'-tūs, s. [Prefix uro-, and Gr. lēptos=peeled.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Oxytrichidae, with seven species, all from fresh water. Animalcules free-swimming, elongate, highly elastic, but maintaining the same general contour; posterior extremity usually produced in an attenuate tail-like manner; ventral surface with three or four anterior or frontal styles, and usually two lines of setae.

ūr-rōl'-ō-gý, ūr-ōn-ōl'-ō-gý, s. [Greek ouron=urine, and logos=a word, a discourse.]

Med.: That branch of medicine which treats of urine.

ūr-rōl'-ō-phūs, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. lophos=a crest.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Trygonidae, with seven small species from tropical seas. Tail of moderate length, with a distinct rayed terminal fin, armed with a barbed spine; rudimentary dorsal sometimes present.

ūr-ō-mās'-tix, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. mastix=a whip.]

Zoöl.: Thorn-tailed Agamas; a genus of Agamidae, with five species, from the south of Russia, northern Africa, and Central India. Body covered with small scales; tail with rings of large spiny scales.

ūr-ō-nē'-mā, s. [URONEMUS.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Pleuronemidae (q. v.), with one species, Uronema marinum, from vegetable infusions in salt and fresh water. Animalcules free-swimming, oval or elongate, persistent in shape; oral aperture ventral; body ciliated, setae at posterior extremity.

ūr-ō-nē'-mūs, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. nēma=a thread.] [PHANEROPLEURON.]

ūr-ō-nyč'-tēr-is, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. nykteris=a bat.]

Zoöl.: A genus or section of Bats, erected by Gray (Proc. Zoöl. Soc., 1862, p. 262) for Cynopterus albiventer, which is now merged in Harpyia, under the name of H. cephalotes.

ūr-ō-pēl'-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin uropeltis; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: Rough-tail Snakes, Rough-tailed Burrowing Snakes; a family of Innocuous Colubriiform Snakes, with five genera and eighteen species, strictly confined to Ceylon and the adjacent parts of southern India. Body cylindrical, head sharp and pointed, tail short and truncated, with a naked terminal plate, which is sometimes replaced by keeled scales; teeth in both jaws. They sometimes burrow to a distance of four feet below the surface.

ūr-ō-pēl'-tīs, subst. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. peltē=a shield.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Uropeltidae, with one species, from Ceylon.

ūr-ō-plān'-ī-a, s. [Gr. ouron=urine, and planē=a wandering; Fr. uroplanie.]

Pathol.: The transport of urine to some part of the body where its presence is abnormal.

ūr-rōp'-ō-da, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. pous (genit. podos)=a foot.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Gamasidae. Palpi and rostrum inferior; dorsal shield of a single broad circular or oval piece; legs nearly equal. Uropoda vegetans is a small mite, parasitic upon beetles, to which these pests attach themselves by a cord believed to consist of their excrement.

ūr-rōp'-sile, s. [UROPSILUS.] Any individual of the genus Uropsilus (q. v.).

ūr-rōp'-sī-lūs, s. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. psilos=stripped of hair, bare.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Mygalidae, closely allied to the Shrews. [SHREW-FOOTED UROPSILE.]

ūr-ō-pýg'-ī-āl, a. [UROPYGIUM.] Of, belonging to, or connected with the uropygium. Specifically applied to a peculiar sebaceous gland developed in many birds in the skin covering the coccyx. It secretes an oily fluid, which the bird spreads over its feathers by the operation of preening. The fluid passes out by one or two apertures, commonly situated upon an elevation, which may or may not be covered with feathers.

ūr-ō-pýg'-ī-ūm, s. [Gr. orropygion=the rump of birds in which the tail-feathers are set (Arist.); generally the rump or tail of any animal.]

Anat.: The coccyx (q. v.).

ūr-rōs'-cō-pý, s. [Gr. ouron=urine, and skopeō=to see, to observe.] The judgment of diseases by inspection of the urine of the patient. [URINAL-IST.]

"In this work, attempts will exceed performances; it being composed by snatches of time, as medical vacations, and uroscopy, would permit."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

ūr-ō-sphēn, s. [Prefix uro-, and Gr. sphēn=a wedge.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Fistulariidae, from the Eocene of Monte Bolca. The cylindrical body terminates in a large wedge-shaped fin, whence the generic name.

ūr-ō-stīc'-tē, subst. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. stiktos=spotted, dappled.]

Ornith.: A genus of Trochilidae, with two species, from Ecuador. Bill straight and longer than the head; nostrils not covered with plumes; wings pointed; tail slight, forked.

ūr-ō-stý'-lā, s. [Pref. uro-, and Greek stylos=a pillar.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Oxytrichidae, with four species from fresh water. They have the general character of the family, but the ventral setae are developed in great abundance.

ūr-rōt'-rīch-ūs, subst. [Pref. uro-, and Gr. thrix (genit. trichos)=hair.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Mygalidae, intermediate between the Desmans and the Moles, and agreeing with the Shrews in having only two incisors in the lower jaw. Nose elongated into a snout, with nostrils at tip; tail stout, covered with long hairs. Two or three species, from Japan and North America.

ūr-ōx, s. [AUROCHS.]

ūr-ōx-ān'-īc, adj. [Eng. ur(ic); (all)oxan, and suffix -ic.] Derived from or containing uric acid and alloxan.

uroxanic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_5N_4H_{10}O_6$. A dibasic acid obtained by boiling uric acid with strong potash lye, allowing the solution to remain in contact with the air for several months, and decomposing the resulting salt with hydrochloric or sulphuric acid. It crystallizes in colorless, transparent tetrahedrons, slightly soluble in cold water, insoluble in alcohol. On boiling with water it is decomposed, carbonic anhydride being given off.

uroxanic-anhydride, s.

Chem.: $C_5N_4H_8O_5$. Uroxil, Uroxyl. A yellowish hygroscopic substance obtained by heating uroxanic acid at 130° , till the weight of the residue becomes constant.

ūr-rōx'-īl, ūr-rōx'-ýl, s. [Eng. urox(anic); -il, -yl.] [UROXANIC-ANHYDRIDE.]

ūr-rōx'-īn, s. [Eng. urox(anic); -in.] [ALLOXANTIN.]

ūr-pēth'-īte, subst. [After the Urpeth Colliery, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A member of the Paraffin group of hydrocarbons; soft, like tallow; specific gravity, 0.885; color, yellowish-brown. An analysis yielded Johnson: Carbon, 85.83; hydrogen, 14.17=100. Separated from the ozocerite of the Urpeth Colliery by its ready solubility in cold ether.

ūr-rý, s. [Cf. Gael. uirlich=mold, dust.] A sort of blue or black clay, lying near a vein of coal. (Prov.)

"In the coal-mines they dig a blue or black clay, that lies near the coal, commonly called urry, which is an unripe coal, and is very proper for hot lands, especially pasture ground."—Mortimer: Husbandry.

Ūr-sā, s. [Lat.=(1) a she bear, (2) a constellation.]

Astron.: The Bear; the first word in the name of two constellations.

Ursa Major, s.

Astron.: The Great Bear. The most conspicuous of the twenty ancient northern constellations, its seven leading stars attracting notice all the more conspicuously that there is a certain absence of visible heavenly bodies in the adjacent parts of the sky. The Semitic conception of the constellation was that it resembled a bier with mourners walking behind. [ARCTURUS, BENETNASCH], and it has sometimes been called specifically Lazarus' bier, the four stars constituting a four-sided figure being the bier and the other three, Mary, Martha, and Mary Magdalene, the mourners. It is much like a plow, and is often called the Plow, the rectangle constituting its body, and the three projecting stars its handle. To other minds it suggests a vehicle, whence it has been called the Car of David, and sometimes Charles' Wain, or Wagon. The four stars standing together are the wheels, and the three behind are the shaft. Another name is the Dipper. But astronomers cling to the old classical conception of a bear, of which the four stars, Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, Ursa Majoris, are the hind quarter, and the three the tail. The remaining portions of the animal are marked out by sundry small stars of the third and fourth magnitude. The Bear was supposed to require a ward or keeper. [ARCTURUS.] The Arabs gave the seven conspicuous stars names, some of which are still in use. They are called Alpha Ursa Majoris or Dubhe; Beta, Merak; Gamma, Phecda; Delta, Megrez; Epsilon, Alioth; Zeta, Mizar; and Eta, Alcaid, or Benetnasch. The first two are called Pointers, because a line drawn from Beta through Alpha and continued for about five times as far as the distance between them will reach the pole-star. Ursa Major is bounded on the north by Draco and Camelopardalis, on the south by Leo Minor, on the east by Canes Venatici, and on the west by Lynx and Camelopardalis. Of the seven stars six are of the second magnitude, the remaining one (Delta) being at present between the third and fourth magnitude. Mizar (Zeta) is a double star. Powerful telescopes show that the Great Bear is made up of many thousand other stars.

Ursa Major and Ursa Minor.

(The Great Bear and the Little Bear.)

Ursa Minor, s.

Astronomy: The Little Bear; one of the twenty ancient northern constellations, bounded by Draco, Camelopardalis, Cassiopeia and Perseus. Its contour is marked out by seven stars. The curvature of the tail is in the contrary direction to that of the Great Bear; and at its tip is a star of the second magnitude, Alpha Ursa Minoris, called Polaris, or the Pole Star (q. v.), midway between Cassiopeia and the Great Bear. Next in brightness are Beta Ursa Minoris, called by the Arabs Kokab, and Gamma Ursa Minoris. The two are sometimes designated the Guards of the Pole, or simply the Guards. Kokab is of the second, and the other of the third. The remaining stars are smaller.

ūr-sā, s. [URSUS.]

Zoöl.: The Ursine-seal. (Annandale.)

ūr-sī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. urs(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zoöl.: Bears; a family of the Carnivora, group Arctoidea, or, in older classifications, Plantigrada (q. v.). Claws, five on each foot, large, strong, and curved, non-retractile; tongue smooth; ears small, erect, and rounded; tail short; nose forming a movable truncated snout; cæcum absent. Though ranged with the Carnivora, many of the Ursidae live entirely or partially on vegetable diet, and their teeth are modified accordingly. They are widely distributed, but are entirely absent from the Australian and Ethiopian regions, and only one species, Ursus (or Tremarctos) ornatus, from the Andes of Peru and Chili. Wallace reckons fifteen species, which have been grouped into as many as five genera (Ursus, Thalassarctos, Helarctos, Melursus or Prochilus, and Tremarctos); Mivart (Proc. Zoöl. Soc. 1885, p. 395) makes two genera (Ursus and Melursus); and Prof. Flower (Encyc. Brit. ed. 9th, art. Mammalia) includes Ailuropus, an annectant form connecting Ursus with Ailurus (q. v.).

2. Palæont.: The family appears first in the Miocene.

ūr-sī-form, a. [Lat. ursus=a bear, and forma=form.] Having the form or shape of a bear; resembling a bear.

ūr-sīne, a. [Lat. ursinus, from ursus=a bear.] Pertaining to or resembling a bear.

ursine-dasyure, s.

Zoöl.: Dasyurus ursinus, the Native or Tasmanian Devil. In outward appearance it somewhat resembles a small bear with a long tail; the body is about two feet in length; general color, a brownish-black, with a broad white band across the chest, and another over the hack close to the tail. They commit great havoc among sheep and poultry, and are a match for an ordinary dog. In confinement they appear to be untamably savage. They are true Marsupials, and have the jaw inflected, but in dental characters and in general habits they resemble the Carnivora. Found only in Tasmania.

Ursine-dasyure.

ursine-howler, s.

Zoöl.: Mycetes ursinus, a large monkey from South America. The body is about three feet long, and the tail slightly longer; color, rich reddish-brown.

ursine-seal, s. [NORTHERN FUR-SEAL.]

ŭr-sī-tāx'-ūs, s. [Mod. Lat. ursus, and taxus (q. v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of Melidæ, allied to Mellivora (q. v.), from the Sivalik Hills. [SIVALIK-STRATA.]

ŭr'-sōn, s. [Prob. from Lat. ursus (q. v.).]

Zoölogy: Erythron dorsatum, a North American species of Tree-porcupine. When full-grown it is about two feet long, covered with woolly hair mixed with long, coarse, dark-brown hair, with white or yellowish points. It is distributed almost universally over the Eastern United States, and north through Canada till the limit of the trees is reached. Called also the Canadian Porcupine.

ŭr'-sōne, s. [Mod. Latin (Arctostaphylos uva-ursi); -one (Chem.).]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}O$ (?). A resinous body, obtained by treating the leaves of the red bear-berry (Arctostaphylos uva-ursi) with ether in a displacement apparatus, and purifying by crystallization from alcohol. It forms slender, colorless needles, having a silky luster, tasteless, inodorous, insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 190° to 200°, and solidifies again in the crystalline form on cooling.

ŭr'-su-line, a. & s. [Named after St. Ursula, a famous British virgin and martyr, who is said to have suffered at Cologne, with 11,000 companions, in the fourth century. The enormous number of St. Ursula's companions has been since explained as originating in a mistake of the early copyists, who found some such entry as—"Ursula, et xi. M. V.," which (taking M for millia) they read as "Ursula and 11,000 virgins," instead of "Ursula and eleven martyr virgins." (Smith: Christ. Biog., iv. 1071.)]

Church History:

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the congregations described under B.

"In the Milanese alone there were eighteen Ursuline houses at the death of St. Charles."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 827.

B. As subst. (pl.): An order of nuns developed from a society founded by St. Angela Merici of Brescia (1470-1540) in 1537, under the invocation of St. Ursula (see etym.). The objects of the institution were, nursing the sick, the education of girls, and the sanctification of the lives of the members; and the foundation was confirmed by Pope Paul III. in 1544. Till the beginning of the seventeenth century the vows were simple, but in 1612 a bull was obtained from Pope Paul V., making the congregation a religious order, with strict inclosure and solemn vows, a fourth—that of instructing the young—being added to the usual three. Since that time several distinct congregations have been formed.

ur'-sūs, s. [Lat.=a bear.]

1. Zoölogy: The type-genus of Ursidæ (q. v.), with the range of the family. Dental formula, I. $\frac{3}{1}$, C. $\frac{1}{1}$, P.M. $\frac{2}{1}$, M. $\frac{3}{1}$. Milk teeth comparatively small, and shed at an early age; body heavy; feet broad, and completely plantigrade; the five toes on each foot all well developed, and armed with long, compressed, slightly-curved, non-retractile claws; palms and soles naked; tail very short; ears moderate, erect, rounded, hairy; fur generally long, soft, and shaggy. Prof. Flower groups the species in the following sections:

(1) Thalassarcos. Head comparatively small, molar teeth small and narrow, soles more covered with hair than in the other sections. Ursus maritimus, the Polar or White Bear.

(2) Ursus proper; U. arctos, the Common Brown Bear of Europe and Asia, a very variable species, U. syriacus (the Syrian), and U. isabellinus (the Isabelline Bear), if really distinct species, are nearly related; U. tibetanus, japonicus, and americanus, the Black Bears of the Himalayas, Japan, and North America; U. ornatus, the Spectacled Bear of the Peruvian Andes.

(3) Helarcos. Head short and broad, molars comparatively broad, tongue long and extensile, fur short and smooth. U. malayanus, the Malay or Sun Bear.

2. Palæont.: [BEAR (1), s., I. 1 (2).]

ŭr'-tī-cā, s. [Lat.=a nettle, a stinging nettle; uro=to burn.]

Botany: Nettle; the typical genus of Urticaceæ (q. v.). Herbs, rarely shrubs, with stinging hairs and a tenacious inner bark. Leaves opposite, with stinging hairs; calyx four-partite; males with four stamens, and the rudiments of an ovary; females with a subsessile, penicillate stigma; fruit an achene. Known species thirty-seven, from temperate and tropical climes. Urtica urentissima, called in Timor the Daoum Setan (the Devil's Leaf) is said by the natives to produce effects continuing about a year, or even to cause death. U. (=Laportea) crenulata, an Indian species, is also formidable. [LAPORTEA.] U. stimulans of Java is less violent. The fibers of U. tenacissima, called in Sumatra, Caloose, can be manufactured into very tough cordage; those of U. cannabina may be similarly employed. The tubers of U. tuberosa are eaten raw, boiled, or roasted by the natives of India. U. simensis, the Sama of Abyssinia, though acrid, is eaten in that country. The leaves and the seeds of U. membranacea, an Egyptian plant, are considered emmenagogue and aphrodisiac. Flogging with nettles was formerly practiced for arthritis and paralysis. The old U. heterophylla, the Neilgherry Nettle, is now Girardinia heterophylla. [GIRARDINIA.]

ŭr'-tī-cā'-cē-æ, ŭr'-tīc'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. urtic (a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acēæ, -eæ.]

Bot.: Nettleworts; an order of Diclinox Exogens, typical of the alliance Urticales. Trees, shrubs, or herbs, never milky. Leaves alternate, usually covered with asperities or stinging hairs; stipules membranous, often deciduous; flowers small, green, unisexual, scattered, clustered, in catkins or in close heads; calyx membranous, persistent—in the males it is four or five-parted, with four or five stamens inserted into its base opposite to its lobes; females with a tubular, four to five-cleft calyx, three to five staminodes, the style simple or wanting, the stigma simple, fringed, the ovary superior, sessile, one-celled, with a single erect ovule; the fruit a simple indehiscent nut surrounded by the calyx. Nettleworts are widely distributed over the world, flourishing both in hot and in cold countries, and often following the footsteps of man. Known genera, twenty-three; species, 300 or more. (Lindley.) Genera, forty-three; species, 500. (Sir Joseph Hooker.)

ŭr'-tī-cā'-cē-ōūs (or ceous as shūs), a. [URTICACEÆ.] Having the character of a nettle; belonging to the Urticaceæ.

ŭr'-tī-cāl, a. [URTICALES.]

Bot.: Of or belonging to the genus Urtica or to the order Urticaceæ. (Lindley.)

ŭr'-tī-cā'-lēš, s. pl. [Masc. or fem. pl. of Mod. Lat. urticalis.] [URTICA.]

Bot.: The Urtical Alliance; Lindley's nineteenth alliance of Exogenous plants. Diclinox Exogens, with scattered monochlamydeous flowers, single superior carpels, and a large embryo lying in a small quantity of albumen. Orders: Stilaginaceæ, Urticaceæ, Ceratophyllaceæ, Cannabinaceæ, Moraceæ, Artocarpaceæ, and Platanaceæ.

ŭr'-tī-cār'-ī-a, s. [Fem. of Mod. Lat. urticarius =stinging like a nettle, from Lat. urtica (q. v.).]

Pathol.: Nettle-rash; a non-contagious eruption on the skin, producing prominent patches or wheals, accompanied by great heat and itching. It may be acute or chronic, continuing for months or even for years. It is often caused by derangement of the digestive organs, by over fatigue, or by mental anxiety. Steel, cold or tepid baths, and a simple diet will often do it good.

ŭr'-tī-cāte, v. i. or t. [URTICA.]

A. Intrans.: To act so as to annoy or irritate. "He not only urticates, he hurts."—G. A. Sala: America Revisited, i. 271.

B. Trans.: To annoy, to irritate.

"While he urticates you, he utters a low crooning murmur."—G. A. Sala: America Revisited, i. 270.

ŭr'-tī-cāt-īng, pr. par. or adject. [URTICATE.] Stinging like a nettle; pertaining to urtication.

urticating-cells, s. pl. Thread-cells. [CNIDÆ.]

ŭr'-tī-cā'-tion, s. [Lat. urtica=a nettle.] The stinging of nettles, or a similar stinging; the whipping of a benumbed or paralytic limb with nettles to restore its feeling.

ŭ-rū'-bū, s. [Native name.]

Ornithology: Cathartes iota (or atrata), from the Southern States of the Union and Central South America. It is often confounded with the Turkey-buzzard (q. v.), from which, however, it may be readily distinguished by the absence of the ring of feathers round the throat. General color black; head and naked part of neck bluish-black with warts and a few hair-like feathers. Called also Black Vulture and Zopilote.

ŭr'-ūs, s. [Lat. See def.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A kind of ox, the Bos urus of Cæsar (De Bello Gallico, vi. 28), now called Bos primigenius. It differs from the Aurochs (q. v.) in its larger size, the double curvature of its horns, &c. It existed from the Pleistocene almost to historic times, always diminishing in size, and Prof. Boyd Dawkins thinks it may not be specifically distinct from Bos taurus. (Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxiii. 392-401.) [Bos, Ox, REEM.]

"It proves that the urus was living in Britain as late as the Bronze Age."—Dawkins: Early Man in Britain, ch. x.

ŭ-rū'-shī, s. [See def.] The Japanese name of the varnish or lacquer tree, Rhus vernix, or vernificera.

ŭr'-ūs-īte, s. [After the Urus plateau, Tscheleken Island, Caspian Sea; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A hydrated sulphate of soda and sesquioxide of iron, probably related to sideronatriite (q. v.), but needing further examination.

ŭr'-vā, s. [Mod. Lat., from native name.]

Zoöl.: Crab-Mungos; a sub-genus of Herpestes, with one species, Urva cancrivora, from India. It is nearly three feet in length, of which the tail occupies about a third. A narrow stripe of white hairs runs from the shoulders, contrasting very decidedly with the grayish-brown tint of the fur; there are some very faintly marked darker bars on the body, and the tail is marked with three or four faint transverse bars; feet and legs of uniform dark tint. Its habits are aquatic, and it feeds on frogs and crabs.

ŭr'-vānt, ŭr'-vēd, a. [Etym. doubtful.]

Heraldry: Turned or bowed upward.

ŭr'-voel'-gŷ-īte (ē long), subst. [After Urvölgy, the Hungarian name for Herregrund, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in semi-spherical aggregations of thin hexahedral plates, associated with malachite and other minerals in a conglomerate. Hardness, 2.5; specific gravity, 3.132; luster, vitreous to pearly; color, shades of emerald to bluish green. Composition: A hydrated sulphate of copper and lime, hut, as Dana suggests, it "needs further examination on the chemical side." More frequently known under the name of Herregrundite.

ŭr'-zēl'-lā, s. [West African native name of the plant.]

Bot. & Comm.: Roccella fusiformis, a dye-lichen exported from Western Africa.

ūs, ous, ows, pron. [A. S. ús (dat.), ús, úsic, ussic (accus. pl.); cogn. with Dut. ons; Icel. oss (accus. & dat.); Sw. oss; Dan. os; Ger. uns; Goth. uns, unsis.] The plural of the first personal pronoun. Used—ū-sū-rŷ (s as zh), u-su-re, u-su-rie, u-sur-rye, u-se-rie, s. [Fr. usure=the occupation of a thing, usury, from Lat. usura=use, usury, from usus, fut. par. of utor=to use.]

*1. Any premium or interest paid, or stipulated to be paid, for the loan of money, without any insinuation that the interest asked was exorbitant.

"Wherefore then gavest thou not my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury?"—Luke xix. 23.

2. An excessive or exorbitant interest or premium paid, or stipulated to be paid, for the loan of money.

3. The practice of lending money at interest; the practice of taking interest for money lent; specifically, the practice of taking exorbitant or excessive interest for the loan of money; the practice of exacting interest in an exorbitant way from needy or extravagant borrowers.

"In the ancient world, interest was always usurious as it is in the East at the present day. The Mosaic Law prohibited taking interest from Hebrews (Exod. xxii. 25; Levit. xxv. 35-37; Deut. xxiii. 20); and Christ's words, 'Give to him that asketh thee,' (Matt. v. 42) seem to be of still wider application. The Fathers regarded interest as usury, and therefore as a species of robbery; and this opinion prevailed in the Church till the sixteenth century, and numbered Luther and Melancthon among its defenders. Calvin appears to have been the first theologian who propounded the modern distinction between interest and usury.

ūt, s. [See def.]

Music: The name given to the first or key note in the musical scale of Guido, from being the first word in the Latin hymn, "Ut queant laxis," &c. Except among the French, it has been superseded by do (q. v.). [GAMUT.]

Ū-tāh (or Yŷ-ta), s. [Named from a tribe of Am. Indians.] One of the States of the U. S. A. Bounded W. by Nevada, N. by Idaho, NE. by Wyoming, E. by Colorado, and S. by Arizona. Area, 84,190 square miles. First settlement made by the Mormons in 1847 on the border of Great Salt Lake. They established a government and named it the State of Deseret. In 1848 the country was ceded to the United States by Mexico. September 9, 1850, Congress organized it into a Territory under the name of Utah. The Federal assumption of authority met with determined resistance, and in 1856 the United States appointees to territorial office fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, qŕ, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

were driven from the territory. These troubles continued with the government until 1858, the country being occupied by detachments of the United States army. In the early years of the settlement of the country (1852) occurred the infamous Mountain Meadow massacre, on which occasion an entire emigrant train, consisting of several hundreds of persons, was exterminated by a band of Mormons and Indians under the leadership of John D. Lee and others. For this crime, after the restoration of authority in the Territory, shortly after the close of the civil war, Lee was arraigned, tried, and convicted, and in 1871 was executed by shooting. Utah was admitted as a State of the U. S. A., January 4, 1896. It is famed for the grandeur of its scenery and the health-giving properties of its climate. The mountains range from 12,000 to 13,700 feet, the mean elevation being 6,110 feet. The principal rivers, Colorado, Grand and Green. Besides the Great Salt Lake there are numerous smaller salt lakes, and a number of fresh water lakes, the largest of the latter being Utah Lake, which lies 4,475 feet above sea level. The chief industries of the State are agriculture and mining. Wheat, oats, corn, barley and potatoes are produced in abundance. Fruits of the finest flavor are abundant. The live-stock interest is important. The principal minerals are gold, lead and copper. Salt and sulphur are produced in abundance. Iron and coal are mined. Limestone, granite, sandstone and slate are quarried. Climate mild and healthy. Spring opens in April; cold weather begins late in November. Principal cities, Salt Lake City, the capital and metropolis; Ogden, important railroad and manufacturing center; Provo and Logan.

ū-tah-ite, s. [After Utah, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in minute micaceous crystals as an incrustation upon a quartzite in the Eureka Hill mines, Juab Co., Utah. Crystallization, rhombohedral; luster, silky; color, brownish-yellow. Composition: Sulphuric acid, 28.45; arsenic acid, 3.19; sesquioxide of iron, 58.82; water, 9.35 = 99.81, yielding formula $As_2O_5 \cdot 3Fe_2O_3 \cdot 3SO_3 + 4H_2O$.

2. Born of the same mother, but by a different father.

ū-tēr-ō, pref. [Lat. uterus=the womb.]

Anat., Physiol., &c.: Of, belonging to, or carried on within the womb.

ū-tēr-ō-gēs-tā-tion, s. [Pref. utero-, and Eng. gestation.]

Biol.: The development of the fecundated ovum within the uterus. [PREGNANCY.]

ū-tēr-ūs, s. [Lat.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The womb.

II. Technically:

1. Anatomy:

(1) Compar.: A dilation in the walls of the oviduct for the preservation or development of the ova. In Birds, although the ova are developed externally, the term uterus is often applied to that cavity where the eggs receive the shell. In most of the Viviparous Fishes, and in the Viviparous Lacertilia and Ophidia the ova develop within the uterine cavity without any assistance or nourishment from the mother. In the Prototheria (= Ornithodelphia=Monotremata) the oviducts, according to some authorities, have no distinct uterine or Fallopian portion, but open directly into a cloacal chamber. Gegenbaur, however, calls the lower end of each oviduct a uterus. In the Metatheria (=Didelphia=Marsupialia) each of the oviducts is differentiated into uterine and Fallopian tracts, opening into a long and distinct vagina. In the Eutheria (=Monodelphia, including all other Mammals) the uterus is variously modified. In the Primates it is normally single, though instances of a double uterus occasionally occur; it is two-horned in the Ruminantia, Pachydermata, Equidae, and Cetacea, and is said to be divided when it has only a very short body, which speedily divides externally and internally, and is continuous with the oviducts (as in most of the Carnivora and Edentata, and some of the Rodentia); it is actually double in some of the Edentata and in most of the Rodentia, including the mouse and the hare, each oviduct passing into an intestiniform uterus, which has two completely distinct openings lying near to each other within the vagina.

(2) Human: A hollow, muscular organ, with very thick walls, situated in the pelvic cavity, between the rectum and the bladder. The virgin uterus is about three inches long, two broad, and one inch thick at its upper extremity. The middle part is called the body, the upper the fundus, and the lower, opening into the vagina, the neck. Its chief function is to receive the ovum from the Fallopian tubes, and to retain and support it during the development of the foetus, which it expels by muscular contractions at parturition. During uterogestation the uterus becomes greatly enlarged and undergoes important structural changes.

Pathol.: The uterus is liable to many affections and diseases, as tumors, ulceration, catarrh, tenesmus, hæmorrhage, &c.

Compar. Anat.: The prostatic vesicle. It varies considerably in size; in man it is small, in the rabbit it is of considerable extent. It is developed from the same portion of the embryo as the female uterus. [UTERUS, II.]

ūt'-gard, s. [Icel.=out yard.]

Scand. Mythol.: The uttermost borders of the habitable world, where antiquity fixed the abode of giants and monsters; hell. (Grimm. Deut. Mythol., ed. Stallybrass, i. 245.)

ū-tīle, a. [Fr., from Latin utilis, from utor=to use.] Useful, profitable, beneficial. (Levins.)

ū-tīl-i-tār'-i-an, adj. & subst. [Eng. utilit(y); -arian.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to utility.

2. Pertaining or relating to utilitarianism.

"The author of this essay has reason for believing himself to be the first person who brought the word utilitarian into use. He did not invent it, but adopted it from a passing expression in Mr. Galt's 'Annals of the Parish.' After using it as a designation for several years, he and others abandoned it from a growing dislike to anything resembling a badge or watchword of sectarian distinction. But, as a name for one single opinion, not a set of opinions—to denote the recognition of utility as a standard, not any particular way of applying it—the term supplies a want in the language, and offers in many cases a convenient mode of avoiding tiresome circumlocution."—J. S. Mill: Utilitarianism, ch. ii. (Note.)

B. As subst.: One who upholds the doctrine of utilitarianism.

"Although Utilitarians hold that good and evil, right and wrong are properly determined by a calculation of the consequences as regards human happiness, they do not all maintain that past or existing systems of morals have been on all points founded on this principle."—Chambers' Encyc. (ed. 1867), ix. 684.

ū-tīl-i-tār'-i-an-ism, subst. [Eng. utilitarian; -ism.]

Ethics: A word coined by J. Stuart Mill to denote that system which makes the happiness of mankind the criterion of right. It is thus more extensive than Epicureanism, which constituted personal happiness a criterion for the individual, leaving the happiness of others out of the question. The system owes its origin to Bentham (1748-1832), was attacked by Macaulay in the Edinburgh Review, and is thus defined by J. S. Mill: "The creed which accepts, as the foundation of morals, Utility, or the Greatest Happiness Principle, holds that actions are right in proportion as they tend to promote happiness, wrong as they tend to promote the reverse of happiness. By happiness is intended pleasure, and the absence of pain; by unhappiness, pain, and the privation of pleasure. To give a clear view of the moral standard set up by the theory much more requires to be said; in particular what things it includes in the ideas of pain or pleasure; and to what extent this is left an open question. But these supplementary explanations do not affect the theory of life on which this theory of morality is grounded—namely, that pleasure and freedom from pain are the only things desirable as ends; and that all desirable things (which are as numerous in the utilitarian as in any other scheme are desirable either for the pleasure inherent in themselves, or as means to the promotion of pleasures and the prevention of pain."

ū-tīl-i-tŷ, u-tīl-i-te, u-tīl-i-tie, subst. [Fr. utilité, from Lat. utilitatem, accus. of utilitas=usefulness, from utilis=useful, from utor=to use; Sp. utilidad; Ital. utilità.]

1. The quality or state of being useful; usefulness; the quality of being servicable or conducive to some desirable end or purpose; use, advantageousness, serviceableness.

"Utility is that quality in things in virtue of which they afford satisfaction and enjoyment to those who possess them, or create a desire in persons to get possession of them. Utility is the source of value in all valuable things. Anything that is useless for any purpose whatever, is without any value. Nevertheless, utility, like value, is not a quality inherent in things themselves, but arises from the fact that things are desired, and only so far as they are desired."—Bithell: Counting-House Dict.

2. The greatest happiness of the greatest number; the fundamental principle of Utilitarianism (q. v.).

"A perfectly just conception of Utility or Happiness, considered as the directive rule of human conduct."—J. S. Mill: Utilitarianism, ch. ii.

ū-tīl-i-zā-tion, s. [Eng. utiliz(e); -ation.] The act of utilizing or turning to some useful account; the state of being utilized.

ū-tīl-ize, ū-tīl-ize, v. t. [Fr. utiliser, from utile=useful.] [UTILE.] To turn to some useful or profitable account; to make useful or profitable; to save from waste or loss by making use of.

"In the Edinburgh Review, for 1809 . . . exception is taken to . . . utilize."—Fitzedward Hall.

ū-tī pōs-sī-dē-tis, phr. [Lat.=as you possess.]

1. Civil Law: An interdict as to heritage, ultimately assimilated to the interdict utrubi as to movables whereby the colorable possession of a bonā fide possessor is continued until the final settlement of a contested right.

2. International Law: The basis or principle of a treaty which leaves belligerent parties in possession of what they have acquired by their arms during the war.

ū-tīs, ū-tās, ou-tas, s. [From a Norm. Fr. word corresponding to O. Fr. oitaves, oitaves, pl. of oitawe=octave or eighth (day), from Lat. octava (dies)=the eighth (day).] [OCTAVE.]

1. The octave of a legal term, saint's day, or other festival; the space of eight days after it; also the festival itself.

"To assemble the utas of saint George at Westmynster."—Berners: Froissart; Cronycle, vol. ii., ch. xcii.

2. Merriment, festivity, jollity, stir, bustle.

"Then here will be old utts: it will be an excellent stratagem."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., ii. 4.

ūt-lā-rŷ, ūt-lāw-rŷ, s. [A corruption of out-lawry.] Outlawry.

"Where processe of utlawry lieth."—Camden: Remaines; Surnames.

Shakesp.: Richard III., v. 3.

¶ Utmost is frequently used substantively, preceded by the, a possessive pronoun or noun, or other word of a like limiting force, to signify, the most that can be; the greatest power, the highest degree, the greatest effort, or the like.

"Though he perform to the utmost of a man."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, i. 1.

Ū-tō'-pī-a, subst. [The weight of authority is in favor of the generally accepted derivation from Gr. ou=not, and topos=a place, hence, Utopia=nowhere (Cf. Scotch kennaquhair; Ger. Weissnichtwo, used by Carlyle in Sartor Resartus). Another derivation is from Gr. eu=well (in comp.=happy, fortunate, blessed), and topos=place, when Utopia would=a happy place, a land of perfection. (See Notes and Queries, 7th ser., v. 101.)]

1. A name coined by Sir Thomas More, and used by him (in his celebrated work so called, published in 1513), to signify an imaginary island, where everything is perfect—the laws, the morals, the politics, &c.; the evils and defects of existing laws being shown by contrast.

2. A place or state of ideal perfection.

"I shall give thee . . . the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession."—Psalms ii. 8.

2. Utmost, extreme.

¶ Uttermost is also used substantively in the same way as utmost=the most that can be done; the utmost; the greatest power, degree, or effort.

"They . . . seemed resolved to defend their coast to the uttermost."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. iii., ch. i.

ū-vā (pl. ū-vāe), s. [Lat.=a bunch or cluster of grapes.]

1. Bot.: A succulent indehiscent fruit, with a central placenta and a very thin outer pericarp. Examples: the fruit of the vine, that of solanum, &c. Deemed by most botanists an unnecessary term.

2. Pharm. (pl.): Raisins; used only to sweeten preparations.

ūva ursi, s.

Bot. & Pharm.: Tournefort's name for the genus now called Arctostaphylos (q. v.). The name is still retained as a convenient abbreviation in pharmacy, bear-berry leaves being called Uvæ ursi folia. [BEAR-BERRY.]

u-vār-ī-a, subst. [Lat. uva=a bunch of grapes, which the fruit resembles.]

Bot.: A genus of Xylopeae. Flowers hermaphrodite, petals equal, stamens flattened, ovaries linear, cylindrical, inserted, as are the stamens, into a flat receptacle. Natives of tropical or sub-tropical countries in the eastern hemisphere. The roots of Uvaria naryum, a large, woody, Indian climber, yield, by distillation, a sweet-scented, greenish oil, used in various diseases in Malabar. The aromatic root is also employed medicinally. The bruised leaves smell like cinnamon. The bark of U. tripetaloidea, when tapped, yields a viscid and fragrant gum. The leaves of U. triloba are applied to languid abscesses to bring them to a head. The fruit of U. febrifuga is regarded by the Indians of the Orinoco as an excellent febrifuge.

ū-vāte, s. [UVA.] A conserve made of grapes. (Simmonds.)

ū-vē-a, s. [UVA.]

Anat.: A covering of dark pigment at the posterior surface of the iris.

ū-vē-ōūs, a. [UVA.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: Resembling a grape or a bunch of grapes.

"The uveous coat or iris of the eye."—Ray: Creation, pt. ii.

u-vīt-īc, adj. [Lat. uv(a) = a grape; Eng. suff. -itic.] Of, pertaining to, or derived from grapes.

uvitic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_9H_8O_4 = C_6H_3(CH_3)(CO \cdot OH)_2$. A dibasic aromatic acid, obtained by boiling pyroracemic acid with excess of baryta water. It crystallizes in fine needles, difficultly soluble in water, more readily in alcohol and ether, and melts at 287°. Heated with lime to 350°, it yields calcic carbonate and metatoluolate, at a higher temperature yielding toluene.

ū-vrōū, ū-vrōw, s. [EUPHROE.]

ū-vū-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Lat. uva (q. v.).]

Anatomy:

1. Gen.: Any projecting portion; as, the uvula of the bladder or of the cerebellum.

2. Spec.: A prolongation of the soft palate at the back of the mouth. It is a small cylindrical body which hangs at the middle of the posterior margin of the soft palate. It possesses some minute glands, and can be elevated and shortened by a muscle, the azygos uvulae. A relaxed sore throat is mainly produced by an enlargement of the uvula with a certain amount of oedema; if unusually long it is frequently necessary to cut it. [TONSIL.]

"By an instrument bended up at one end, I got up behind the uvula."—Wiseman: Surgery.

ū-vū-lar, a. [UVULA.] Of or pertaining to the uvula; as, the uvular glands.

ū-vū-lār-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin uvular(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Melanthaceae.

ū-vū-lār-ī-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from uvula (q. v.).]

Botany: The typical genus of Uvularae (q. v.). Leaves sessile, amplexicaul; flowers solitary, drooping, like those of Polygonatum, but having the style three-cleft, and the fruit dry and three-celled. The species are astringent, and the bruised leaves of Uvularia grandiflora are a popular remedy for the bite of the rattlesnake.

ū-vū-lar-lī, adv. [Eng. uvular; -ly.] With thickness of voice or utterance, as when the uvula is too long.

"Number Two laughed (very uvularly)."—Dickens: Uncommercial Traveller, iii.

ū-vū-lā-wōrt, s. [Mod. Lat. uvula, and Eng. wort.]

Bot.: Campanula trachelium, the Nettle-leaved Bell-flower. Leaves ovate, lanceolate, hispid, coarsely doubly serrate; peduncles generally few flowered; racemes panicle; corolla bluish-purple. So named because it was supposed to be of use in swelling and pain of the throat. [THROATWORT (1).]

ū-wā-rō-wīte (w as v), s. [After the Russian Minister Uwarof, Uvarof, Uvarov, Uwarow; Russ. ouwarovit.]

Min.: A variety of garnet (q. v.) of an emerald-green color, in which a part of the alumina is replaced by sesquioxide of chromium. Originally from the Ural Mountains, but now found, though sparsely, in several other parts of the world.

ūx-ōr-ī-al, a. [Lat. uxor=a wife.]

"The carnality and uxoriousness of the Jews."—More: Mystery of Godliness, p. 100.

ŭ-zë-ma, s. [Native word.] A linear measure in the Birman Empire, equal to about twelve statute miles.

THE twenty-second letter, and the fifteenth consonant of the English alphabet, represents a labial or labio-dental consonant sound, and is produced by the junction of the lower lip and upper teeth, as in ov, eve, vain. The sound of v differs from that of f, which is produced in the same way, in being voiced, while that of f is breathed. Both v and f are also continuous consonants, and also belong to the class of the spirants. V in Middle English is commonly written u in MSS., and conversely u sometimes appears as v, most frequently at the beginning of words, and especially in the word vs, vse, vp, vnto, vnder, and vn, used as a prefix. As noted under U, u and v were formerly the same letter, and in dictionaries and alphabetical lists words beginning with U and V were, up till a comparatively recent date, combined. [U.] The Latin v, or rather consonant u, was probably pronounced as w: as in vespa=wasp. A very large proportion of the words which begin with v are of French or Latin origin, only vane, vat, vinewed, and vixen being English. The letter v did not exist in Anglo-Saxon, its sound being represented by f, as in heofon=heaven, of=of (ov). [F.] By this may be explained the change of consonant in the plurals in such words as thief, pl. thieves, wolf, pl. wolves, &c. V frequently replaces f, as in vat=Mid. Eng. fat; vetches=Mid. Eng. fetches (at the present day so pronounced in the Midland counties), &c. In the dialects of the South of England v is still commonly used when other dialects had f: as vo=foe, vinger=finger, &c. V in some Romance words represents ph, as vial=phial, Mid. Eng. visnomy=physiognomy, &c. V has been changed to (1) w in periwinkle=Fr. pervenche, Lat. perivinca; (2) to m in malmsey=Mid. Eng. malvesie, O. Fr. malvoisie. In vulgar speech, especially of Londoners, v is sometimes used for w, and, conversely, w for v; as, vell for well, very for very. V never appears as a final letter in English (though a final v sound often occurs), nor is it ever doubled.

V as a symbol is used:

1. As a numeral: For 5, and with a dash over it (V̄) for 5,000.
2. In Chem.: For the element Vanadium.
3. In Her.: For vert, in the tricking of arms with a pen and ink. [TRICK, v., 3.]
4. In Law, &c.: For versus (Lat.=against); as, John Doe v. Richard Roe.
5. In Physics, &c.: For velocity or volume.
6. In Music: As an abbreviation of violino, violini, voce, volta, &c.
7. In Finance: For $5; as, I'll give a V for it. (From the letter V on the bill.)
8. In Electrics: As a symbol for volt.

va, v. i. [Ital.]

Music: Go on; as, va crescendo=go on increasing the power; va rallentando=go on dragging the time.

vaag'-mår, s. [Icel. våg-meri=wave-mare.]

Ichthy.: Trachypterus arcticus, from the Northern seas. The body is extremely compressed, whence it is also called the Riband-shaped Vaagmar and Deal-fish.

vaal'-ite, s. [After the Vaal River, South Africa; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A monoclinic mineral, occurring in hexagonal prisms in an altered enstatite rock and in the "blue ground" of the diamond mines of South Africa. Composition: A hydrated silicate of magnesia, alumina, and sesquioxide of iron. On heating, it expands to six times its ordinary size. Probably an altered mica.

vaccinal-fever, s.

Pathol.: A slight fever often arising between the sixth and ninth day after vaccination. Sometimes there is an eruption of vaccine lichen or roseola, continuing about a week.

vāc-çī-nāte, v. t. [As if from a Lat. vaccinatus, pa. par. of vaccino=to inoculate, from Lat. vaccinus=pertaining to cows; vacca=a cow.] To inoculate with the cow-pox by means of vaccine matter or lymph, taken directly or indirectly from the cow, for the purpose of procuring immunity from small-pox, or of mitigating its attack.

vāc-çīn-ā'-tion, s. [Eng. vaccinat(e); -ion; Fr. vaccination.]

1. Pathology: The act or art of vaccinating; the introduction of vaccine matter into the human frame with the view of protecting it against small-pox, or rendering that disease less formidable. It was at first supposed that the cow-pox (q. v.) had arisen by the transmission to the cow of a disease in the horse called "grease," the purulent matter of which was largely employed by Jenner and others for vaccinating purposes, at first after it had been passed through the cow and afterward by direct transmission. Its employment has long since been abandoned. The cow-pox is not produced in the human frame by effluvia; actual inoculation is required. When vaccine lymph is introduced into the arm of an infant, by one or more punctures of a lancet, no noticeable effect is discernible for two days. Then a slight papula arises, which, on the fifth or sixth day, becomes of a bluish color and vesicular, with a raised head and a central cup. On the eighth day it reaches full development, and an inflammatory areola appears, which spreads with the extension of the vesicle for two more days. Then a crust or scale is produced in the center of the vesicle, and gradually extends till it covers it in every part. On the fourteenth or fifteenth day the scale becomes hard and brown; it next contracts, dries, and blackens, until, between the twentieth and the twenty-fifth day, it falls off, leaving a permanent circular, depressed, and foveated cicatrix. Unless it possess all these characters, and specially unless foveation be present, vaccination is imperfect, and cannot be relied on as a prophylactic against smallpox. It has been established also that four, or at least two, such cicatrices are essential for protection, and that the operation should be repeated in ten to twelve, or, at most, in fourteen years. [REVACCINATION.] Various objections have been brought forward against vaccination; the only one to which importance is attached by medical men is that a danger exists of introducing syphilis into the frame by the use of infected lymph. Dr. Farr deduced from the statistics of smallpox epidemics that if 100,000 vaccinated persons be exposed to certain risks of contagion, 100 will be attacked, ten of which will die; while if 100,000 unvaccinated people be exposed to the same risks, at least 600 will be attacked, of whom 270 will die. The English commission of 1873 settled the question in the minds of legislators, as all statistics have since done. The German Vaccination Commission of 1884 came to the following conclusions:

"With rare exceptions, one survived attack of smallpox confers immunity against subsequent attacks. Vaccination exerts a similar protection. The duration of the protection varies within wide limits, but is, on the average, ten years. At least two well-developed vaccine vesicles are necessary to insure an efficient protection. Revaccination is necessary ten years after primary vaccination. The vaccinated condition of the community increases the relative protection against smallpox acquired by the individual and hence vaccination is beneficial not only individually but generally. Vaccination may have an injurious effect under certain circumstances. In the use of human lymph, the danger of transferring syphilis, however slight, cannot be entirely excluded. Any other bad effects are apparently only due to the consequences of the wound, e. g., erysipelas, &c. All these dangers may by precaution be reduced to such a minimum as to make the benefit of vaccination infinitely outweigh them. Since the introduction of vaccination, no scientifically-proved increase of any particular disease or of the general mortality has occurred. Since the dangers to health and life (vaccination-syphilis, &c.) occasionally connected with the use of human lymph can be avoided by the use of animal lymph, and since vaccination with animal lymph has been recently so perfected as almost to equal vaccination with human lymph, the latter is to be gradually superseded by animal lymph."

Anti-vaccinationists allege: (1) That vaccination does not prevent smallpox. (2) That it does not mitigate smallpox, since in Scotland in 1871 there died of smallpox 517 vaccinated infants in the first year of life, and therefore within an average of six months of their vaccination, these alone being one-tenth of the total victims in that country. (3) That vaccination is itself a grave danger to life and health, as proved by the great increase, since the enforcement of vaccination by law, in infant mortality from diseases confessedly inoculable—skin diseases having increased 187 per cent., scrofula 259 per cent., syphilis more than 300 per cent., in children in the first year of life.

2. Law: In most of the cities and towns of the United States civic ordinances require the vaccination of children before their admission to the public schools. [ANTIVACCINATIONIST.]

văc'-cîn-ă-tôr, s. [Eng. vaccinat(e); -or.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who vaccinates.

2. Surg.: An instrument for introducing vaccine virus beneath the skin.

văc'-cîne, a. & s. [Lat. vaccinus, from vacca=a cow.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to cows; derived or obtained from cows.

"Nothing would probably disabuse the vaccine intellect of the idea that a new sort of wild animal had got hold of it."—London Daily Telegraph.

B. As subst.: [VACCINE-LYMPH.]

vaccine-lichen, s.

Pathol.: A kind of lichen sometimes appearing in connection with Vaccinal Fever (q. v.).

vaccine-lymph, vaccine-matter, s.

Med.: A pure pellucid liquid taken directly or indirectly from the udder of a cow suffering from cow-pox. [VACCINATION.]

vaccine-roseola, s.

Pathol.: A variety of roseola occasionally arising in connection with vaccine fever (q. v.).

văc'-cîn-î-ă, văc-çî'-nă, s. [Mod. Lat., from vacca=a cow.]

Pathol.: Cowpox (q. v.).

văc'-cîn-î-ă-çě-æ, s. pl. [Modern Latin vaccini(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Cranberries; an order of Epigynous Exogens, alliance Cinchonales. Much-branched shrubs or small trees often evergreen, sometimes parasitic. Leaves alternate entire, often with glandular notches, exstipulate; flowers solitary or in racemes; calyx, superior, entire, or with four to six lobes. Corolla monopetalous, with the same number of divisions as the calyx, imbricated in æstivation; stamens inserted in an epigynous disc, twice as many as the lobes of the corolla; anthers two-horned, two-celled, bursting by pores. Ovary inferior, with four to ten cells, each with one or many minute seeds. The species occur in temperate regions, in swamps or subalpine districts. They are widely diffused over both hemispheres. Their bark and leaves are astringent, their berries pleasantly subacid. Known genera, fourteen; species, two hundred. (Lindley.) [VACCINIEÆ.]

văc'-cîn-îc, a. [Lat. vaccin(us)=of or belonging to a cow; Eng. suff. -ic.] Contained in or derived from cow's milk.

vaccinic-acid, s.

Chem.: Lerch's name for an acid he obtained by the saponification of butter from cow's milk. It appears to have been a mixture of butyric and cupric acids.

văc'-cîn-î-ě-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vaccini(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eeæ.]

Bot.: A sub-order of Ericaceæ, having the buds clothed with scales, the stamens epigynous, and the ovary inferior. (Sir J. Hooker.) It is equal in extent with the order Vacciniaceæ (q. v.).

văc'-cîn-î-fěr, s. [Eng. vaccine, and Lat. fero=to bear.] One from whose body lymph is taken for the purpose of vaccination.

"The child of such parents should be set aside and not used as a vaccinifer."—Bryant: Manual of Surgery (1879), i. 95.

văc'-cîn-îst, s. [Eng. vaccin(e); -ist.] A vaccinator.

văc'-cîn-î-ŭm, s. [Lat.=the whortleberry (Vaccinium myrtillus).] See def.]

1. Bot.: Whortleberry; the typical genus of Vacciniaceæ (q. v.). Shrubs with alternate, and, as a rule, evergreen leaves; calyx tube short, limb four or five-toothed; corolla, urceolate or campanulate, four to five cleft; stamens, eight to ten; berry globose, four to five-celled, many-seeded. Known species, about a hundred, from America, Europe, and Asia. Vaccinium Oxyccoccus, of Linnaeus, is now Oxyccoccus palustris. [BILBERRY, CRANBERRY.] The Cowberry has rigid, wiry, tortuous stems, evergreen obovate leaves dotted beneath, terminal drooping racemes of pale flesh-colored flowers, open at the mouth and with spreading segments. It is found on heaths and mountains or in woods, and is diffused here and there in the north of Europe, Siberia, and North America. V. leschenaultii, growing on the mountains of Southern India and Ceylon from 4,000 to 8,000 feet high, bears an edible fruit.

2. Palæobot.: A species occurs in the Miocene and one in the Pleistocene. (Etheridge.)

văc-çî'-nô-, prefix. [VACCINE.] Of, pertaining to, consisting of or produced by vaccine matter.

vaccino-syphilitic, a.

Pathol.: Of or belonging to inoculation partly vaccinic, partly syphilitic. [VACCINATION.]

vă-çhěl'-lî-ă, subst. [Named after Rev. G. H. Vachell, residing in China.]

Bot.: An old genus of Acaciæ, now reduced to a sub-genus of Acacia, or altogether merged into that genus. Vachellia farnesiana, now Acacia farnesiana, is a large shrub or small tree, with bipinnate leaves having four to eight pinnæ, each with ten to twenty pairs of narrow, blunt leaflets. The flowers, which are in little globular heads, are the Cassie flowers of commerce, which, macerated in fine olive oil, yield a perfume like that of violets. The tree seems to be indigenous only in the tropics of America, but it is now cultivated in most hot countries, and has extended even to the south of Europe.

va'-çher (er as â), s. [French, from vache (Lat. vacca)=a cow.] The stock or cattle-keeper on the prairies of the southwest.

va'-çhěr-ŷ, s. [Fr. vacherie, from vache=a cow.]

1. A pen or inclosure for cows.

2. A dairy.

3. A place-name for farms.

¶ Provincial in all its uses.

văç'-il-lan-çŷ, s. [Latin vacillans, pr. par. of vacillo=to vacillate (q. v.).] The state of vacillating or wavering; vacillation, wavering, inconstancy.

"I deny that all mutability implies imperfection, though some does, as that vacillancy in human souls."—More: Divine Dialogues.

văç'-il-lant, adj. [Latin vacillans, pr. par. of vacillo.] Vacillating, wavering, inconstant.

văç'-il-lâte, v. i. [Latin vacillatus, pa. par. of vacillo=to sway to and fro, to reel, to vacillate. Prob. allied to Eng. wag (q. v.).]

*1. Lit.: To reel; to sway to and fro; to stagger, to waver.

"It is always liable to shift and vacillate from one axis to another."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. xxii.

2. Fig.: To fluctuate in mind or opinion; to waver; to be inconstant or unsteady in opinion or resolution.

văç'-il-lât-îng, pr. par. or a. [VACILLATE.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

*1. Lit.: Swaying to and fro; reeling.

2. Fig.: Fluctuating or wavering in opinion; unsteady in opinion or resolution; inconstant.

văç'-il-lât-îng-lŷ, adv. [English vacillatingly.] In a vacillating or wavering manner; unsteadily.

văç'-il-lă-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. vacillationem, accus. of vacillatio, from vacillatus, pa. par. of vacillo=to vacillate (q. v.).]

*1. Lit.: The act or state of vacillating, reeling, or swaying to and fro; a reeling, a staggering.

"Put in motion by every slip or vacillation of the body." Paley: Nat. Theology, ch. xi.

2. Fig.: Vacillating conduct, fluctuation, or wavering of mind; inconstancy of opinion or resolution.

"Vacillation cannot be considered as a proof of dishonesty."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

văç'-il-lă-tôr-ŷ, a. [Eng. vacillat(e); -ory.] Inclined to vacillate or waver; vacillating, unsteady.

"Such vacillatory accounts of affairs."—North: Examen, i. 25.

va-cô'-ă, va-côu'-ă, s. [Fr. vacoa, vacua, vacua. (Littre.)]

Bot.: Pandanus utilis. It grows wild in Mauritius, &c., and is, moreover, cultivated for its leaves, which are made into square bags for the reception of sugar for export.

văc'-u-âte, v. t. [Latin vacuatus, pa. par. of vacuo=to empty, from vacuus=empty.] To make empty, to evacuate, to empty, to annul.

"Like the Pharisees' Corban, under the pretense of an extraordinary service to God, vacuates all duty to man."—Secular Priest Exposed, p. 21.

văc'-u-ă-tion, s. [VACUATE.] The act of emptying; evacuation.

văç'-u-îst, s. [VACUUM.] One who holds the doctrine of a vacuum in nature; opposed to a plenist.

"It would also appear that there may be a much subtler body than common air, and as yet unobserved by the vacuists."—Boyle: Works, iii. 251.

va-cû'-î-tŷ, *va-cu-i-tie, s. [Fr. vacuité, from Lat. vacuitatem, accus. of vacuitas, from vacuus=empty.]

*1. The state of being vacuous, empty, or unfilled; emptiness.

"Hunger is such a state of vacuity, as to require a fresh supply of aliment."—Arbuthnot.

*2. The state of being devoid or destitute of anything.

"Men are at first without understanding or knowledge at all. Nevertheless from this vacuitie they grow by degrees till they come at length to be even as the angels themselves be."—Hooker: Eccles. Politie, bk. i., § 6.

3. Freedom from mental exertion; rest from brain-work; vacancy.

"Teaching his brain to repose with a wise vacuity."—Blackie: Lays of Highlands and Islands, p. 98.

4. Absence of intelligence in look or countenance; expression showing want of thought or intelligence; vacancy, listlessness.

*5. Space unfilled or unoccupied, or occupied with an invisible fluid only; a vacuum.

"In filling up vacuities, turning out shadows and ceremonies."—Hammond: Fundamentals.

*6. Want of reality; inanity, imbecility.

"Their expectations will meet with vacuity and emptiness."—Glanvill.

*7. A thing of no import or sequence; an idle nothing.

"No sad vacuities his heart annoy." Wordsworth: Descriptive Sketches.

văç'-u-ô-lăt-ěd, a. [English vacuol(e); -ated.] Full of vacuoles, or small air-cavities.

văç'-u-ô-lă-tion, s. [Eng. vacuol(e); -ation.]

Biol.: The multiplication of vacuoles in the germ development or in that of animals low in the scale of being. [VACUOLE.]

văç'-u-ôle, s. [Mod. Lat. vacuolum, dimin. from Lat. vacuum (q. v.).]

Biol.: A cavity, chiefly that formed in the interior of a mass of protoplasm by the filtering into it of drops of water. It is used in this sense of the fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fáll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camel, hěr, thêre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb. cūre, unite, cūr, rûle, fûll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = â. qu = kw.

blood-corpuscles which are destitute of granules, but may be filled with water. The term, however, is chiefly applied to the apparently empty spaces in the protoplasm of the Rhizopoda, Infusoria, &c. These spaces are of two kinds—water-spaces comparatively persistent, and food-vacuoles formed temporarily around particles of food generally enveloped in a drop of water. [POLYGASTRICA.] The term vacuole is used also of the cells which occur in the protoplasm of plants.

văc'-u-ous, a. [Lat. vacuus=empty, from vaco=to be empty.] [VACANT.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Empty, unfilled.

"Boundless the deep, because I AM who fill Infinitude; nor vacuous the space."

Milton: P. L., vii. 169.

*2. Biol.: Used when an organ does not contain what normally belongs to it; thus, bracts are called vacuous when they contain no flower, although they occupy such a situation as to suggest that they are flower-bearing.

văc'-u-ous-ness, s. [Eng. vacuous; -ness.] The quality or state of being vacuous or empty; emptiness.

"In their vacuousness the winds and vapors of tediousness and displicence rise."—Mountague: Devoute Essayes, pt. i., treat. 9, § 5.

văc'-u-um (pl. văc'-u-umș or văc'-u-a), subst. [Lat. neut. sing. of vacuus=empty, from vaco=to be empty.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A void, a vacuity.

2. Physics: A space which contains no material substance. The general way of obtaining a vacuum is to pump the air out of a closed space by means of an air-pump; but the vacuum which can be obtained by an ordinary air-pump is not very perfect. Much better results are obtained with the mercury-pump, of which there are several forms, in all of which the air is caught by a falling column of mercury and carried down a long tube out into the surrounding air. Another method of obtaining a vacuum is the chemical method, which consists in filling a space with carbonic acid gas, and afterward introducing some caustic potash, which absorbs the gas. Such a thing as a perfect vacuum has never been obtained, and probably never will be obtained. Even as practically meant, it is always understood that the vacuum only extends to matter, and that the space is still filled by ether. [TORRICELLIAN.] vacuum-brake, s.

Rail.: A form of steam-brake in which the power employed is the pressure of the atmosphere produced by creating a vacuum.

vacuum-gauge, s.

Steam-eng.: An instrument for indicating difference between the external atmospheric pressure and the pressure inside a partially exhausted vessel; such as a steam-boiler which has become cold and in which the steam has condensed; a condenser in which the steam from the cylinder is condensed; the receiver of an air-pump.

vacuum-pan, s.

Sugar-manuf.: A vessel for boiling saccharine juices in vacuo in the process of making sugar. Its form is usually nearly spheroidal, and it is made in two segmental nearly semi-globular portions, united at the equator by external flanges. At the top is a dome, into which the vapor rises, and from which it is drawn either by a pump or a condenser. The peculiar feature of the vacuum-pan is that, by the exclusion of the air, the quality and quantity of the crystallizable sugar are increased, a smaller proportion of grape-sugar, or molasses being obtained.

vacuum-pump, s.

Steam-engine:

1. A pump used for withdrawing the air from a boiler or chamber, in order that it may be filled with water forced in under atmospheric pressure. It is employed in connection with marine engines.

2. A pump in which the condensation of steam is made use of to produce a vacuum for the purpose of raising water.

vacuum-tubes, s. pl.

Physics: Tubes blown and twisted into different shapes, and hermetically sealed with two platinum wires or electrodes fused with them for the passage of an electric current or spark. Previously to sealing they are exhausted, with the exception of a very small quantity of air or other gases. Under these circumstances electric discharge causes various phosphorescent glows (according to the gas employed in the tube) which may assume peculiar forms, as of layers or strata. Sometimes phosphorescent glass is employed for the tubes themselves, which is illuminated by the glow in the gas. Called also Gassiot or Geissler tubes, from the inventor and chief investigator. Another distinct class of these tubes is prepared with extremely high vacua, ranging to one ten-millionth of an atmosphere, and with various contained apparatus. In such vacua, the mean free path of the gaseous molecules is vastly increased, and many phenomena occur, which were discovered and mainly investigated by Mr. William Crookes, who considers them to represent a fourth state of matter, as distinct from the ordinary gaseous form as that is from the condition of a fluid.

vacuum-valve, s. A reversed safety-valve, opening inwardly to the pressure of the atmosphere when there is a negative pressure in the boiler.

văde, v. i. [A weakened form of fade (q. v.).]

1. To fade, to wither.

"His summer leaves all vaded."

Shakesp.: Richard II., i. 2.

2. To go, to vanish; to pass away; to depart.

"Her power, disperst, through all the world did vade."
Spenser: Ruins of Rome, xx.

vă-dě mē'-cūm, subst. [Lat.=go with me.] A book or other thing that a person carries with him as a constant companion; a manual; a pocket companion.

văd'-i-mōn-ŷ, s. [Latin vadimonium, from vas (genit. vadis)=a surety, a bail.]

Old Law: A bond or pledge to appear before a judge on a certain day.

vă-dī-um, s. [Lat. vas (genit. vadis)=a surety, a bail.]

Scots Law: A word, a pledge, or surety.

adium-mortuum, s. A mortgage.

adium-vivum, s. A living pledge.

văe, s. [VOE.]

vă-frouș, a. [Lat. vafer=sly, cunning.] Cunning, crafty, sly.

"He that deals with a fox may be held very simple if he expect not his vafrous tricks."—Feltham: Resolves, res. 42.

văg'-a-bōnd, v. i. [VAGABOND, adj.] To play the vagabond; to wander about in an idle manner; to vagabondize.

"Vagabonding it out yonder."—C. Reade: Cloister and Hearth, ch. lvi.

văg'-a-bōnd, *vac-a-bond, *vac-a-bonde, *vac-a-bound, *vac-o-bond, *vac-a-bund, *vag-a-bund, *vag-a-bunde, adj. & s. [Fr. vagabond, from Latin vagabundus=wandering about, from vagor=to wander.]

A. As adjective:

1. Wandering about without having any settled habitation.

"Doubtless the author of this libell was some vagabond huckster or pedler."—Hackluyt: Voyages, i. 586.

2. Floating about without any certain direction; driven to and fro.

"By envious winds

Blown vagabond or frustrate." Milton: P. L., xi. 16.

3. Pertaining to a vagabond or worthless stroller.

B. As substantive:

*1. One who wanders about, not having any settled home; a wanderer, a vagrant. (Not necessarily in a bad sense.)

"The question was whether he and his posterity should reign on an ancestral throne or should be vagabonds and beggars."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. x.

2. An idle, worthless stroller from place to place, without any fixed habitation or means of living; hence, in law, an idle, worthless vagrant. Now in law used chiefly in the phrase, A rogue and a vagabond. [VAGRANT, B. II.]

"To vagabondys and other that lokyd for pylfry and ryflynge, it was a great occasyon & styrynge."—Fabyan: Chronycle (an. 1456).

3. An idle, worthless fellow; a scamp, a rascal. [Colloq.]

"What a brainsick vagabond art thou!"

Cowper: Homer's Odyssey, xviii.

văg'-a-bōnd-age (age as ĭg), văg'-a-bōnd-ism, s. [Eng. vagabond; -age, -ism.]

1. The state, condition, ways, or habits of a vagabond.

"Given over to vagabondage and deeds of rascality."—Scribner's Magazine, March, 1880, p. 769.

2. Vagabonds collectively.

"To increase the vagabondism of the neighborhood."—Mayhew: London Labor and London Poor, iii. 322.

văg'-a-bōnd-ism, s. [VAGABONDAGE.]

văg'-a-bōnd-ize, văg'-a-bōnd-ise, v. i. [Eng. vagabond; -ize, -ise.] To wander about as a vagabond.

"Afterward vagabondizing for a couple of years."—London Daily Telegraph.

văg'-a-bōnd-rŷ, s. [English vagabond; -ry.] Vagabondage.

văg-a-būn'-dæ, s. pl. [Fem. pl. of Latin vagabundus=strolling about, vagabond.]

Zool.: A sub-tribe of Spiders, tribe Dipneumones or Dipneumonæ (q. v.). Ocelli usually in three rows. The species wander about, spinning no webs. Families, Salticidæ and Lycosidæ.

vă'-gæ, s. pl. [Fem. pl. of Lat. vagus=strolling about, wandering.]

Botany: The sixty-eighth order in Linnæus' Natural System. It was only provisional, and contained all his doubtful genera.

vă'-gal, a. [Mod. Lat. vag(us); Eng. suff. -al.] Of or pertaining to the vagus (q. v.).

vă'-gan-çŷ, s. [Lat. vagans, pr. par. of vagor=to wander.]

1. Vagrancy.

2. Extravagance.

"A thousand vagancies of glory and delight."—Milton: Church Government, ch. i.

vă'-gant, *va-gaunt, a. [Fr. vagant.] Wandering, vagrant.

"Fro thi face I shal be hid, and I shal be vagaunt."—Wycliffe: Genesis iv. 14.

†vă-găn'-tēs, s. pl. [Pl. of Lat. vagans, pr. par. of vago=to wander.]

Zool.: A group of Walcknæer's Araneidæ. They are the same as his Laterigradæ (q. v.). The name Vagantes was given because these spiders lead a wandering life, except during oviposition.

vă-ga-rant, a. [VAGRANT.]

vă-găr'-i-ous, a. [Eng. vagary; -ous.] Having vagaries; whimsical.

"The names of the wandering Jew are characteristically various, not to say vagarious."—M. D. Conway: Wandering Jew, ch. x.

vă-găr-îsh, a. [VAGARY.] Wandering.

"His eyes were often vagarish."

Wolcott: P. Pindar, p. 305.

vă-găr'-ŷ, *va-gare, *fi-gar-y, s. [VAGARY, v.]

*1. A wandering; a strolling.

"The people called Phœnices gave themselves to long vagaries and continual viages by sea."—Barnaby RICH.

2. A wandering of the thoughts; a wild freak; a whim; a whimsical purpose.

"Straight they changed their minds, Flew off, and into strange vagaries fell."

Milton: P. L., vi. 614.

vă-găr'-ŷ, v. i. [Latin vagor=to wander; Fr. vaguer; Ital. vagare.] To wander about; to wind.

"The three rivers that vagary up to her."—Nashe: Lenten Stuffe.

vă-gă'-tion, s. [Lat. vagatio, from vagor=to wander.] A wandering; a roving about.

vă'-gi-ent, a. [Lat. vagiens, pr. par. of vagio=to cry like a child.] Crying like a child.

"The cradle of the Cretan Jove, And guardians of his vagient infancy."

More: Song of the Soul, iii. 4, 42.

vă-gi'-nă, s. [Lat.=a sheath, a scabbard.]

1. Anatomy:

(1) Comp.: A special canal in the female for the reception of an intromittent organ, or the deposition of sperm-cells.

(2) Human: A dilatable membranous passage extending from the vulva to the uterus, the neck of which it embraces. It rests below and behind on the rectum, and supports the bladder in front.

2. Arch.: The upper part of the shaft of a terminus, from which the bust or figure seems to issue or arise.

3. Bot.: A sheath, as of grasses.

vă-gi'-năl, a. [VAGINA.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to or resembling a sheath; as, a vaginal membrane.

2. Anatomy, Pathology, &c.:

(1) Of or pertaining to anything shaped like a sheath or scabbard; as, the vaginal process (q. v.).

(2) Of or pertaining to the vagina (q. v.); as, the vaginal artery. The term is frequently used in Pathology; as, vaginal catarrh, cystocele, enterocoele, hyperæsthesia, &c.

vaginal-artery, s.

Anat.: A branch of the internal iliac artery.

vaginal-catarrh, or leucorrhæa, s.

Path.: [VAGINITIS].

vaginal-plexus, s.

Wordsworth: Ruth.

2. An idle wanderer or stroller; a vagabond, a tramp.

"The civil war expelled all sturdy vagrants from the city."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 13.

II. Law: In law the term vagrant is much more comprehensive than in ordinary language, and the idea of wandering is almost lost. Vagrants are divided into three grades:

(1) Idle and disorderly persons, or such as, while able to maintain themselves and families, neglect to do so; unlicensed peddlers, beggars, common prostitutes, &c.; all of whom are liable to imprisonment or fine or both.

(2) Rogues and vagabonds, or such as having been convicted of being idle and disorderly persons, have been found guilty of a repeated offense; fortune-tellers and other like impostors, persons gambling or betting in public, persons having no visible occupation and unable to give a satisfactory account of themselves; all of whom are liable to imprisonment or fine or both.

(3) Incurable rogues, or such as, having been convicted as rogues and vagabonds, are found guilty of a repetition of the offense; persons breaking out of legal confinement, &c.; all of whom are liable to imprisonment, sometimes for long terms under the habitual criminal acts of some of the states.

Pope: Rape of the Lock, iv. 122.

*7. Showy, ostentatious.

"Load some vain church with old theatric state."

Pope: Moral Essays, iv. 29.

¶ Vain and fruitless are both applied to our endeavors; but the term vain is the more general and indefinite. What we aim at, as well as what we strive for, may be vain; but fruitless refers only to the end of our labors. When the object aimed at is general in its import, it is common to term the endeavor vain when it cannot attain this object; when labor is specifically employed for the attainment of a particular object, it is usual to term it fruitless if it fail.

¶ 1. For vain: To no purpose; fruitlessly, idly, in vain.

"Which the air beats for vain."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, ii. 4.

Vai-sē'-shī-kā, s. [Sans. vaishesha=an atom.]

Hindu Philos.: One of the six leading systems of Brahmanic philosophy. 'At first only three of the six—viz., the two Mimāṃsās and the Nyāya—were considered orthodox; but ultimately the three rejected—the Vaiseshika, the Sankhya, and the Yoga—were exempted from the ban of heresy. The founder of the Vaiseshika system was Kanāda, whose exact date is unknown, but it may be vaguely conjectured as about 500 B. C. The system assumes or establishes that all material substances are composed of atoms mechanically united. These atoms it regards as eternal in their duration. The combinations of them which form the present world are, however, but transitory; so also is the present system of things. The Vaiseshika philosophy is generally connected with the Nyāya or Logical school of Gautama, of which it is supposed to be a modification.

Vaish'-nā-va, s. [Sansc., &c.]

Hinduism (pl.): A primary religious section of the Hindus, who adore Vishnu in preference to, if not to the exclusion of, the other persons of the Hindu Triad. To carry individual preference to this extent is not considered orthodox, and many of those who do so have united themselves into monastic bodies, which, drawing their devotees from various castes, virtually merge them in a new one—that of the Sectarian brotherhood. Horace Hayman Wilson divided the Vaishnavas into the following sections: (1) Rāmānujas, Sri Sampradāyis, or Sri Vaishnavas; (2) Rāmānandis, or Rāmāvats; (3) Kabīr Panthīs; (4) Khākīs; (5) Malūk Dāsīs; (6) Dādū Panthīs; (7) Rāya Dāsīs; (8) Senāīs; (9) Vallabhāchārīs, or Rudra Sampradāyīs; (10) Mirā Bāīs; (11) Madhwāchārīs or Brahma Sampradāyīs; (12) Nīmāvats, or Sanakādī Sampradāyīs; (13) the Vaishnavas of Bengal; (14) Radhā Vallabhīs; (15) the Sakhi Bhāvas; (16) Charan Dāsīs; (17) Harischandīs; (18) Sadhnā Panthīs; (19) Mādhavīs; and (20) Sannyāsīs, Vairāgīs, and Nāgas.

vāl'-ēn-tī-ne, s. [See def.]

*1. A sweetheart or choice made on St. Valentine's day.

"To-morrow is St. Valentine's day,
All in the morning betime!
And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 5.

¶ According to the legend, St. Valentine was beheaded on Feb. 14, at Rome, under Claudius. The old notion was that birds began to couple on that day, and hence arose the custom of young persons of both sexes choosing each other as "valentines" for the ensuing year by a species of lottery, and of sending love missives to each other.

2. A letter or other missive sent by young persons of both sexes to each other on Valentine's day; a printed missive of an amatory or satirical nature, generally sent by post anonymously. Some valentines are highly ornamental and artistic, while others are caricatures, designed to reflect on the personal appearance, habits, character, &c., of the persons to whom they are addressed. The practice of sending valentines by mail appears to be diminishing year by year, the later practice, confined almost exclusively to children, being to insert them under the door of the person to whom they are addressed, and then to knock or ring the door-bell and hurry away. In the various cities of the country many millions of hideous caricatures thus change hands.

Vāl'-ēn-tīn'-i-aŋs, s. pl. [See def.]

Church Hist.: The followers of Valentinus, an Egyptian gnostic, whose sect arose at Rome, then rooted itself deeply in Cyprus, and finally spread throughout a great part of southern Europe, western Asia, and northern Africa. He supposed that in the Pleroma (q. v.) there were thirty male and as many female æons united in wedlock, with four unmarried, these latter being Horus, Christ, the Holy Spirit, and Jesus. The youngest æon, Sophia (Wisdom), brought forth a daughter, Achamoth, whence sprang the Demiurge, who created mankind. This Demiurge, becoming puffed up with pride, aspired to be regarded as the only god, and led many angels into the same error. To repress his insolence, Christ descended, Jesus, one of the highest æons, joining him when he was baptized in Jordan. The Demiurge had him crucified; but, before his death, both Jesus the Son of God and the rational soul of Christ had separated, leaving only the sentient soul and the ethereal body to suffer. The Valentinians were divided into the Ptolemaic, the Secundian, the Heracleonite, the Marcosian, and many other sects.

va-lén'-tín-ite, s. [After Basil Valentine, an alchemist, who discovered some of the properties of antimony; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral, occurring mostly in crystals, but occasionally massive. Hardness, 2.5-3; specific gravity, 5.566; luster, adamantine to pearly; color, white, peach-blossom red, ash-gray; streak, white; translucent to sub-transparent. Composition: Oxygen, 16.44; antimony, 83.56=100, whence the formula SbO_3 . Results from the decomposition of various antimonial ores.

va-lér'-a-çét-ô-ni'-trile, s. [Eng. valer(ic), and acetonitrile.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_2\text{H}_3\text{N}_3\text{O}$. A mobile, colorless liquid found in the neutral oil produced by distilling glue with potassium chromate and sulphuric acid. It has an aromatic odor, is very inflammable, burning with a faintly luminous flame, moderately soluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether; specific gravity, 0.79 at 15°; boils between 68° and 71°.

va-lér'-al, s. [Eng. valer(ic), and aldehyde.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_5\text{H}_{10}\text{O}=\text{CH}_2>\text{CH}\cdot\text{CH}_2\cdot\text{CHO}$. Valeraldehyde, valerianic aldehyde, valerylhydride. A mobile, colorless liquid, discovered by Dumas and Stas. Obtained by oxidizing amylic alcohol with nitric or chromic acid, or by distilling fusel-oil with sulphuric acid. It has a burning, bitter taste, a suffocating apple-like odor, exciting coughing, is insoluble in water, but soluble in all proportions in alcohol, ether, and volatile oils; specific gravity 0.857 at 17°, and boils at 96° under ordinary atmospheric pressure. It is very inflammable, burning with a bright blue-edged flame. When exposed to the air it is gradually converted into valerianic acid.

valeral-ammonia, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_5\text{H}_{10}\text{O}\cdot\text{NH}_3=\text{C}_5\text{H}_9(\text{NH}_4)\text{O}$. A crystalline body prepared by adding ammonia to valeral mixed with a thousand times its bulk of water. It is almost insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts when heated, but recrystallizes on cooling.

va-lér'-ál'-dē-hýde, subst. [Eng. valer(ic), and aldehyde.] [VALERAL.]

vál-ér'-ál'-dide, s. [VALERALDEHYDE.]

vál-ér'-ál'-dine, s. [Eng. valerald(ide); -ine.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_{15}\text{H}_{31}\text{NS}_2$. A viscid oil obtained by passing sulphydric acid into valeral ammonia suspended in water. It has an alkaline reaction, a strong, unpleasant odor, does not solidify at -20°, is insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, and volatilizes without decomposition.

vál-ér'-ám'-íc, adj. [Eng. valer(ic), and amic.] Derived from valeric acid and ammonia.

valeramic-acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_5\text{H}_{11}\text{NO}_2=\text{C}_5\text{H}_9(\text{NH}_2)\text{O}_2$. Amidovaleric acid, valeramidic acid. Discovered by Gorup-Besanez in the pancreas of an ox, and prepared artificially by the action of ammonia on an alcoholic solution of bromovaleric acid. It crystallizes in colorless leaves, somewhat sublimable, is slightly soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether, and unites with acids and bases to form crystallizable compounds. Heated in the air, it burns with a bluish flame; heated in a glass tube, it melts and sublimates, giving off alkaline vapors having the odor of herring-pickle.

va-lér'-a-míde, s. [Eng. valer(ic), and amide.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_7\text{H}_{11}\text{NO}=\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{O}\cdot\text{H}_2\text{N}$. The primary amide of valeric acid, produced by the action of strong ammonia on ethylic valerate. Insoluble in water, melts at 100°, subliming at a somewhat higher temperature, and, when boiled with alkalis, gives off ammonia.

va-lér'-a-míd'-íc, a. [Eng. valeramid(e); -ic.] [VALERAMIC.]

vál-ér'-ám'-íne, s. [Eng. valer(ic), and amine.]

Chem.: Wurtz' original name for amylamine.

vál-ér'-án'-il-ide, s. [Eng. valer(ic); anil(ine), and suff. -ide.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_{11}\text{H}_{15}\text{NO}=\text{C}_5\text{H}_{10}(\text{C}_6\text{H}_5)\text{NO}$. Phenyl-valeramide. A crystalline body, obtained by the action of valeric anhydride on aniline. It is slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 115°, and distills unaltered at 220°.

vál-ér'-ate, s. [Eng. valer(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of valeric acid.

valerate of potassium, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{KO}_2$. Obtained by saturating valeric acid with potassium. It is an amorphous, white, deliquescent, saline mass, soluble in water and in strong alcohol, melts at 140°, and decomposes at a higher temperature.

vál-ér'-éne, subst. [Eng. valer(ic); -ene.] [AMYLENE.]

va-lér'-i-án, s. [VALERIANA.]

Botany:

1. The genus Valeriana (q. v.).

2. Polemonium cœruleum (Britten & Holland). [GREEK-VALERIAN, RED-VALERIAN, SPUR-VALERIAN.]

valerian-oil, s.

Chem.: A pale yellow or greenish oil, obtained by distilling valerian root with water. It has the odor of valerian, an aromatic taste, an acid reaction; specific gravity 0.90-0.93; boils at 200°; becomes viscid at -15°, but does not solidify completely even at -40°. It appears to be a mixture of several substances.

valerian-pug, s.

Entom.: Eupithecia valerianata; a rare European geometer moth, with ashy-brown wings, the caterpillar of which feeds on the common valerian.

va-lér'-i-ā'-na, subst. [From Lat. valeo = to be strong; so named from the powerful medicinal qualities of some species.]

Bot.: Valerian; the typical genus of Valerianaceæ or Valerianæ. Herbs, generally perennial, with radical leaves crowded, those of the stem opposite or whorled, entire or pinnatifid; flowers cymose, with bracteoles; corolla five-cleft, gibbous at the base, stamens three; fruit crowned with a feathery pappus. Known species about 130, from the North Temperate Zone and from South America. The root, which is warm and aromatic, is used in pharmacy in hemiparalysis, spasms, hysteria, epilepsy, chorea, hypochondriasis, and as an auxiliary to tonics in intermittents. Valerian baths have been found of much use in acute rheumatism. In excessive doses it produces headache and mental excitement. It is highly attractive to rats, and also to cats, hence it is called Cats' Valerian; and being much used by the poor as an application to fresh wounds, is named also Allheal. V. pyrenaica, which has very large, cordate, deeply-toothed leaves, is a native of the Pyrenees. V. celtica and V. salicina, natives of the mountains of Austria, are used in the east of Europe to aromatize baths. The roots of V. celtica, V. officinalis, and V. phu are tonic, bitter, aromatic, spasmodic, vermifugal, and perhaps febrifugal. V. sitkensis, Dioscoridis, &c., are powerful stimulants. The strong-scented roots of V. hardwickii and V. wallichii, Himalayan species, are used in India medicinally.

Valeriana Officinalis.

1. Plant; 2. Flower; 3. Leaflets.

va-lér'-i-a-nā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin valeriana, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Valerianworts; an order of Epigynous Exogens, alliance Campanales. Annual or perennial scented herbs, occasionally twining. Leaves collected in rosettes at the root, or distributed upon the stem, opposite, entire, or pinnately divided. Flowers in cymes; calyx superior, the limb membranous or resembling feathery pappus; corolla monopetalous, tubular, inserted in the top of the ovary, two or three lobed, regular or irregular, sometimes with a spur; stamens one to five, inserted into the tube of the corolla, and alternate with its lobes; ovary inferior, one-celled, sometimes with two other abortive cells; seed one, pendulous. Chiefly in temperate climates. Known genera twelve; species 185. (Lindley.)

va-lér'-i-ān-āte, s. [Eng. valerian(ic); -ate.]

1. Chem.: A salt of valerianic acid (q. v.).

2. Pharm.: Valerianate of zinc is a nerve tonic, an antispasmodic, and an anthelmintic. Valerianate of iron and that of ammonia act somewhat similarly; valerianate of soda acts like valerian root; valerianate of quinine is useful in intermittent and spasmodic neuralgic affections.

va-lér'-i-a-nēl'-lā, s. [Dimin. from Mod. Latin valeriana (q. v.).]

Bot.: Corn-salad; a genus of Valerianaceæ. Small annuals, dichotomously branched. Flowers small, bracteate, solitary or cymose in the forks of the branches; corolla regular, funnel-shaped; stamens three; fruit two or three celled, one-seeded. Known species about fifty, chiefly from the north temperate zone.

va-lér'-i-ān'-íc, adj. [Eng. valerian; -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from valerian.

valerianic-acid, a. [VALERIC-ACID.]

valerianic-aldehyde, s. [VALERAL.]

va-lér'-i-ān-wört, s. [Eng. valerian, and wort.] Bot. (pl.): Lindley's name for the Valerianaceæ (q. v.).

va-lér'-íc, a. [Eng. valer(ian); -ic.] Contained in or derived from valerian-root.

valeric-acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_5\text{H}_{10}\text{O}_2=\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{O}\left\{\begin{matrix} \text{H} \\ \text{O} \end{matrix}\right\}$. Delphinic acid; Phocenic acid; Butylcarbonic acid; Valerianic acid. A monobasic acid, first obtained by Chevreul, in 1817, from the fat of Delphinium phocœna, but found widely diffused throughout the vegetable kingdom, in valerian root, angelica root, and in many plants of the composite order. It is prepared artificially by oxidizing amylic alcohol with a mixture of strong sulphuric acid and acid potassic chromate. When pure, it is a colorless, mobile oil, having a sour, burning taste; specific gravity 0.937 at 16°; slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether and in strong acetic acid; does not solidify at -16°, and boils at 184°. With the bases, it forms salts called valerates, none of which is of any importance.

valeric-aldehyde, s. [VALERAL.]

valeric-anhydride, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_{10}\text{H}_{18}\text{O}_3=(\text{CH}_3)_2\text{CH}\cdot\text{CH}_2\cdot\text{CO}_2\text{O}$. Valeric oxide; Valeric valerate. A colorless, mobile oil, prepared by distilling valerate of potassium with oxychloride of phosphorus, washing the distillate with sodic carbonate, dissolving in ether, and evaporating. It has a faint odor of apples; specific gravity 0.934 at 15°; is soluble in ether, and boils at 215°. Water slowly absorbs it, converting it into valeric acid; with alcohol it forms ethylic valerate. [VALERIC-ETHERS.]

valeric-chloride, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{O}_2\text{Cl}$. A colorless, mobile, fuming liquid, produced by the action of phosphorous chloride on valeric acid. It has a specific gravity of 1.005 at 6°, boils at 117°, and is easily decomposed by water into hydrochloric and valeric acids.

valeric-ethers, s. pl.

Chem.: Prepared by distilling sodium valerate with sulphuric acid and the corresponding alcohols: (1) Methylic valerate, $\text{C}_5\text{H}_9(\text{CH}_3)\text{O}_2$, is a colorless liquid, with an odor of valerian and wood spirit; specific gravity 0.8869 at 15°; boils at 116°. (2) Ethylic valerate, $\text{C}_5\text{H}_9(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)\text{O}_2$, is a colorless liquid, of a fruity odor; slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol; specific gravity 0.866 at 15°; boils at 133°.

valeric-oxide, valeric-valerate, s. [VALERIC-ANHYDRIDE.]

vál-ér'-in, s. [Eng. valer(ic), and (glycer)in.]

Chem. (pl.): A series of glycerides obtained by heating valeric acid with glycerine: (1) Monovalerin, $\text{C}_8\text{H}_{16}\text{O}_4=(\text{C}_3\text{H}_5)_3\text{C}(\text{HO})_2(\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{O}_2)$. An oily neutral liquid produced by heating valeric acid with excess of glycerine to 200° for three hours. It has a faint odor; specific gravity 1.100 at 15°; mixes with half its bulk of water to a clear liquid, but separates on the addition of more water, and is decomposed by alcohol, even in the cold. (2) Divalerin, $\text{C}_{13}\text{H}_{24}\text{O}_5=(\text{C}_3\text{H}_5)_2\text{C}(\text{HO})(\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{O}_2)_2$. A neutral oily liquid, obtained by heating valeric acid and glycerine to 275°. It has a disagreeable, fishy odor; specific gravity 1.059 at 15°, solidifies at -40°, and does not mix readily with water. (3) Trivalerin, $\text{C}_{18}\text{H}_{32}\text{O}_6=(\text{C}_3\text{H}_5)_3\text{C}(\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{O}_2)_3$. A neutral oily liquid, produced by heating divalerin to 220°, with ten times its weight of valeric acid. It has an unpleasant odor, is insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol and ether.

vál-ér'-is'-íc, a. [Eng. valer(ic); Gr. isos=the same as, and Eng. suff. -ic.] Contained in or derived from valeric acid.

valerisic-acid, s.

Chem. (pl.): Laurent's name for the substitution products of valeric acid, in which three atoms of hydrogen are replaced by chlorine or other radicles, e. g., chlorovalerisic acid, $\text{C}_5\text{H}_7\text{Cl}_3\text{O}_2$. In like manner, those products in which four atoms of hydrogen are thus replaced are called valerotic acids.

vál-ér'-ô-dī-chlör-hý'-drin, s. [Eng. valero(l), and dichlorhydrin.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_8\text{H}_{14}\text{O}_2\text{Cl}_2=(\text{C}_3\text{H}_5)_3\text{C}(\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{O})\text{O}\cdot\text{Cl}_2$. A mobile liquid, produced by heating epichlorhydrin with valeric chloride to 100°. It smells like amylic acetate, has a specific gravity of 1.149 at 11°, and boils at 245°.

vál-ér'-ô-glýç'-ér-ál, s. [Eng. valero(l); glycer(in), and suff. -al.]

Chemistry: $\text{C}_8\text{H}_{16}\text{O}_3=\left\{\begin{matrix} (\text{C}_3\text{H}_5) \\ \text{H} \end{matrix}\right\}(\text{C}_5\text{H}_9\text{O})\text{O}_3$. A liquid obtained by heating valeral with glycerine to 180°.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

for twenty-four hours. It is insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol, specific gravity 1.027 at 0°, and boils at 224°—228°.

vāl-ēr-ōl', s. [Eng. valer(ian); -ol.]

Chem.: $C_6H_{10}O$? Produced by rapidly distilling valerian oil in a stream of carbonic anhydride. It crystallizes in colorless, transparent prisms, slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol, ether, and volatile oils, melts at 20°, and then remains liquid at ordinary temperatures.

vāl-ēr-ō-lāc'-tīc, a. [Eng. valero(l), and lactic.] Contained in or derived from valeric and lactic acids.

Chem.: $C_5H_9O_3$. Produced by heating bromo-valeric acid with silver oxide and water. Its zinc salts crystallize readily.

vāl-ēr-ōne, s. [Eng. valer(ic); -one.]

Chemistry: $C_9H_{18}O = \frac{C_5H_9}{C_4H_9} O$. Valene, valeryl-butyl, valeroyl-butyloxyde. A transparent, colorless, mobile liquid, obtained by the dry distillation of calcium valerate, mixed with one-sixth of its weight of lime. It is lighter than water, has an ethereal odor and burning taste, soluble in alcohol and ether, specific gravity 0.823 at 20°, and boils at 181°.

vāl-ēr-ō-nī-trīle, subst. [Eng. valero(l), and nitrile.]

Chem.: $C_5H_9N = C_4H_9 \cdot CN$. Butylic cyanide. A colorless oil, produced by heating valeric acid with potassic sulphocyanate. It has the odor of bitter almonds, specific gravity 0.8164 at 0°, and boils at 140°.

vāl-ēr-ō-nyl, s. [Eng. valeron(e); -yl.]

Chem.: Lowig's name for the hydrocarbon C_4H_9 . (Watts.)

vāl-ēr-ōx'-yl, s. [Eng. valer(ic); ox(atyl); -yl.] [VALERYL.]

vāl-ēr-ōyl, s. [Eng. valero(=); -yl.]

Chemistry: A name applied to the hydrocarbon C_5H_9 , according to which denomination valerene may be designated as hydride of valeroyl, C_5H_9H ; valerone as valeroyl butyloxyde, $C_5H_9 \cdot C_4H_9O$, &c. (Watts.)

vāl-ēr-yl, s. [Eng. valer(ic); -yl.]

Chem.: C_5H_9O . Valeroxyl. The radicle of valeric acid and its derivatives, obtained in the free state by the action of sodium on ethylic valerate.

valeryl-butyl, s. [VALERONE.]

valeryl-chloride, s. [VALERIC-CHLORIDE.]

valeryl-hydride, s. [VALERAL.]

valeryl-protoxide, s. [VALERIC-ANHYDRIDE.]

vāl-ēr-yl-ēne, s. [Eng. valeryl; -ene.]

Chem.: C_5H_8 . A colorless, mobile liquid, homologous with acetylene, obtained by heating amylene bromide, with a concentrated alcoholic solution of potash, to 140° for several hours, washing the resulting product with water, distilling, and collecting the liquid which passes over between 44° and 46°. It has a pungent alliaceous odor, is insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol, boils at 46°, and has a vapor density of 2.356.

vāl-ēt, v. t. [VALET, s.] To attend on, as a valet.

"Some dandy old Brown, whom he had valeted in the middle of the last century."—T. Hughes: Tom Brown's Schooldays, pt. i., ch. ii.

vāl-ēt (or as vāl-ê), val-ett, s. [Fr. valet=a groom, a yeoman. The same word as VARLET (q. v.).]

1. A man-servant who attends on his master's person; a valet-de-chambre. Valets or varlets were originally the sons of knights, and afterward of the nobility, before they attained the age of chivalry.

"The king made him his valett (equivalent to what afterward was called gentleman of the bedchamber)."—Fuller: Worthies; Yorkshire.

2. Manège: A kind of goad or stick armed with a point of iron.

valet-de-chambre, s. The same as VALET, s. (q. v.)

"No great man ever appeared great in the eyes of his valet-de-chambre."—Knox: Essays, No. 32.

vāl-ē-tū-dīn-ār'-ī-an, a. & s. [Eng. valetudinarian; -an.]

A. As adj.: Sickly; in a poor state of health; infirm; seeking to recover health.

"Great benefit to the valetudinarian, feeble part of mankind."—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. iii., ch. iv.

B. As subst.: A person of weak health or infirm constitution; an invalid; one who is seeking to recover health.

"That sickly tribe who are commonly known by the name of valetudinarians."—Addison: Spectator, No. 25.

vāl-ē-tū-dīn-ār'-ī-an-īsm, s. [English valetudinarian; -ism.] The state or condition of a valetudinarian; a weak or sickly state of health.

"At an age when most men are condemned to valetudinarianism."—London Daily Telegraph.

vāl-ē-tū-dīn-ār'-ī-nēss, subst. [Eng. valetudinarian; -ness.] The quality or state of being valetudinarian; valetudinarianism.

"Habitual thinness, leanness, tenderness, and valetudinarianess."—Cheyne: Method of Cure, pt. ii., ch. iv.

vāl-ē-tū-dīn-ār'-ī-ōus, a. [Eng. valetudinarian; -ous.] Valetudinarian (q. v.).

"About the beginning of January he began to be very valetudinarianous."—Cotton Mather: Memorable Providences (ed. 1689), p. 55.

vāl-ē-tū-dīn-ār-ỹ, a. & s. [Fr. valétudinaire, from Latin valetudinarius=sickly, from valetudo (genit. valetudinis)=health, good or bad, espec. ill-health, from valeo=to be in good health.]

A. As adjective:

1. (Of persons): In weak or ill-health; infirm, delicate.

"He became valetudinarius for want of exercise."—Genleman's Magazine, Aug., 1757, p. 359.

2. (Of things): Delicate.

"It renders the habit of society dangerously valetudinarius."—Burke: Reflections on Revol. in France.

B. As subst.: One who is in weak or ill-health; a valetudinarian.

vāl-ē-tū-dīn-ōus, a. [VALETUDINARIAN.] Sickly, weak.

"Affrighted with the valetudinous condition of King Edward."—Fuller: Hist. Camb., vii. 35.

Val-hal'-la, s. [Icel. valhöll (genit. valhallar)=the hall of the slain, from valr=slain, slaughter, and höll, hall=a hall.]

1. Scand. Myth.: The place of immortality for the souls of heroes slain in battle, where they spent their time in feasting and drinking.

2. Fig.: Any edifice which is the final resting-place of many of the heroes or great men of a nation; specif., applied to the Pantheon or Temple of Fame, built by Louis I. of Bavaria at Donau-stauf, near Ratisbon, and consecrated to all Germans who have become renowned in war, statesmanship, literature, science, or art.

vāl-i-ance, vāl-i-ān-čỹ (i as y), val-i-aunce, s. [O. Fr. vaillance, vallence, valence; Fr. vaillance, from Lat. valentia, from valens, pr. par. of valeo=to be strong, to be worth.] [VALIANT.] Valor, bravery.

"To let him weet his doughty valiaunce."

Spenser: F. Q., II. iii. 14.

vāl-i-ant (i as y), valiaunt, valyant, a. & s. [Fr. vaillant, valant, pr. par. of valoir=to profit, serve, be good for, from Lat. valeo=to be strong, to be worth; Sp. valiente; Port. & Ital. valente.]

A. As adjective:

*1. Strong; vigorous in body; strong or powerful generally.

"The scent thereof is somewhat valiant."—Fuller: Worthies; Cornwall, i. 206.

2. Brave, courageous, intrepid, puissant.

"Godlike Achilles, valiant as thou art."

Couper: Homer's Iliad, i.

3. Performed with valor or bravery; heroic, intrepid.

"To celebrate the memory of such a valiant combat."—Nelson.

4. Noted for valor or bravery.

"For though he bore a valiant name,

His heart was of a timid frame."

Wordsworth: White Doe, iii.

B. As subst.*: A valiant or brave person.

"Four battles . . . wherein four valiants of David slay four giants."—2 Samuel xxi. (Heading.)

vāl-i-ant-ise (i as y), val-yant-ise, s. [Eng. valiant; -ise.] Valor, bravery, courage.

"Picks quarrels for to show his valiantise."

Bp. Hall: Satires, iv. 4.

vāl-i-ant-lỹ (i as y), adv. [Eng. valiant; -ly.] In a valiant manner; with valor or bravery; bravely, courageously.

"To fight valiantly in defense of their religion."—Addison: Spectator, No. 349.

vāl-i-ant-nēss (i as y), val-i-ant-nesse, subst. [Eng. valiant; -ness.] The quality or state of being valiant; valor, bravery, intrepidity, courage.

"A man of great renowne and valiantnesse."—Holinshead; Chron.; Edward III.

vāl-īd, a. [French valide, from Lat. validus=strong, from valeo=to be strong; Sp., Port. & Ital. valido.]

*1. Strong, powerful, efficient.

2. Supported or grounded on actual fact; well-grounded, sound; capable of being justified or defended; not weak or defective; well-based; as, a valid argument, a valid excuse.

3. Having sufficient legal strength or force; good or sufficient in point of law; incapable of being lawfully overthrown or set aside; executed with the proper formalities; binding in law.

vāl-ī-dāte, v. t. [Low Lat. validatus, pa. par. of valido=to make strong, from Lat. validus=strong.]

1. To make or declare valid; to confirm.

"All the elections are validated."—London Standard.

2. To test the validity of; as, to validate votes.

vāl-ī-dā-tion, subst. [Fr., from Low Lat. validatus, pa. par. of valido=to validate (q. v.).] The act of giving validity.

vā-līd'-ī-tỹ, vā-līd-i-tie, subst. [Fr. validité, from Lat. validitatem, accus. of validitas, from validus=strong, valid (q. v.).]

*1. The quality or state of being strong; strength, power.

2. Strength or force derived from resting on or being supported by fact; soundness, justness, validity; as, the validity of an argument.

3. Legal strength or force; sufficiency in point of law.

*4. Value.

vāl-īd-lỹ, adv. [English valid; -ly.] In a valid manner; so as to be valid.

vāl-īd-nēss, s. [Eng. valid; -ness.] The quality or state of being valid; validity.

vā-līnčh', vē-līnčhe', s. [Etym. doubtful.] A tube for drawing liquors from a cask by the bung-hole.

vā-līse', val-lies, val-lise, s. [Fr. valise, a word of doubtful origin; Sp. valija; Ital. valigia.] A small leather bag or portmanteau to hold a traveler's equipment for short journeys, &c.; a portmanteau; a grip sack.

Val'-kỹr, Val'-kỹr'-ī-ā, s. [Icel. valkyrja, from valkr=the slain.]

Scand. Myth. (pl.): One of the twelve nymphs of Valhalla. They were armed and mounted on fleet horses, and in the thick of battle they selected those whom the Fates had destined to be slain, and conducted them to Valhalla, and served them with mead and ale in the skulls of their enemies. [WISH-MAIDENS.]

Val'-kỹr'-ī-an, a. [VALKYR.] Of or belonging to the Valkyrs (q. v.).

vāl-lān-čỹ, s. [VALANCY.]

vāl-lār, a. & s. [Lat. vallaris, from vallum=a palisaded rampart, from vallus=a stake.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a rampart or palisade.

B. As subst.: A vallar-crown (q. v.).

Roman Antiq.: A crown of gold presented to the soldier who first surmounted a vallum, and forced an entrance into an enemy's camp.

vāl-lār'-īs, s. [Latin vallaris=pertaining to a rampart; vallum=a rampart. So named because one species is used in Java for fences.]

Botany: A genus of Parsonsee (q. v.). Twining Indian shrubs, with opposite leaves, dichotomous interpetiolar peduncles, salver-shaped corollas and follicular fruit.

vāl-lār-ỹ, adj. [Latin vallaris.] The same as VALLAR (q. v.).

vāl-lā-tion, s. [Lat. vallum=a palisaded rampart.] A rampart, an intrenchment, a fortification.

vāl-lā-tōr-ỹ, a. [VALLATION.] Of or pertaining to a rampart or vallum. (See extract under SCRIPTORY, 2.)

vāl-lē-ā, s. [Named by Mutis after Robert Valle of Rouen.]

Botany: A genus of Elæocarpeæ (q. v.). Peruvian trees, with entire cordate leaves, large leafy stipules, five overlapping petals, many stamens, and a muricate capsular fruit.

vāl-lēc'-ū-lā, s. [Mod. Lat.=Class. Lat. vallicula (q. v.).]

Anat.: A deep fossa separating the hemispheres of the cerebellum. (Quain.) Called also a Valley.

vāl-lēr'-ī-ite, s. [After the Swedish mineral-ogist Vallerius; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral of very complex composition, occurring as nodular masses in a dark-greenish limestone at Nya Kopparberg, Wermland, Sweden. Soft, yielding to the nail, and marking paper like graphite; specific gravity, 3.14; color resembling that of pyrrhotite; luster metallic. From several analyses the formula $2CuSFe_2S_3 + 2MgFe_2O_3 + 4HO$ is deduced, which, as Dana suggests, appears to be a very doubtful compound.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; ðion, -şion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, dol.

vāl'-leŷ, *vale, *val-eie, s. [O. Fr. valee; Fr. vallée, from val=a vale (q. v.); Ital. vallata.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A hollow or depression in the surface bounded by hills or mountains, and generally traversed by a stream or river, which receives the drainage of the surrounding heights; a vale.

"On the 3d, Mr. Banks set out early in the morning with some Indian guides, to trace our river up the valley from whence it issues, and examine how far its banks were inhabited."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. i, ch. xvi.

¶ A level tract of great extent and traversed by two or more rivers is, properly speaking, not a valley, but a plain; deep, narrow river-courses are more correctly designated as gorges, glens, ravines, &c.

1. Technically:

1. Anat.: [VALLECULA.]
2. Arch.: The internal angle formed by the junction of two inclined sides of a roof.

3. Geol.: A long depression or hollow on the surface of the earth, margined by ground more or less high. It may be on a vast scale of magnitude, as the bed of an ocean would be if upheaved sufficiently to become land, or it may be comparatively small but broad; or narrow, as a glen or a deep gorge, called by Americans a cañon or gulch. It may be surrounded by hills, or may constitute a depression crossing a country from sea to sea. Valleys of stratification are produced by the decay and removal of shale or other soft rocks, while the less destructible hard rocks remain. Other valleys have been excavated by rivers alone. Many valleys on low-lying plains adjacent to the sea have originally constituted river-beds and banks, then through a depression of the land the ocean has gained access to them, constituting their estuaries; then again upheaval has made them land-valleys. Other valleys have constituted the beds of old lakes. Valleys, resembling troughs, on table-lands are in many cases produced by the flexure of strata laterally, so as to constitute a series of elevations and depressions. A small number of valleys occurring high up mountain-sides may constitute old craters of eruption.

Valley of death tree:

Bot.: The Upas-tree (q. v.).

valley-board, s.

Arch.: The board fixed upon the valley-rafter for the leaden gutter to lie upon.

valley-rafter, valley-piece, s.

Arch.: The rafter which supports the valley.

vāl'-lōy-lēt, s. [Eng. valley; dimin. suff. -let.] A little valley.

"Stream and valley, streamlet and valleylet."—Greenwood: Rain and Rivers (1866), p. 188.

vāl'-lic'-ū-lā, subst. [Dimin. from Lat. vallis=a valley.]

Bot.: One of the intervals between the ribs of the fruit of Umbellifers.

vāl-līs-nēr'-ē-æ, vāl-līs-nēr'-ī-ā'-čē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vallisneria; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ, -aceæ.]

Botany: A tribe of Hydrocharidaceæ, having the ovary one-celled.

vāl-līs-nēr'-ī-a, s. [Named after Antonio Vallisneri (1661-1730), F. R. S., medical professor in the University of Padua, and an eminent Italian botanist.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Vallisneriæ (q. v.). Fresh-water plants, with dioecious flowers. Males on a spadix, corolla monopetalous, with three segments. Females singly in a spathe, on a spiral peduncle; calyx monophyllous, corolla polypetalous, capsules one-celled, many-seeded, the seeds attached to a parietal placenta. Both sexes grow at the bottom of running water, and to effect fertilization the spiral peduncle of the female flower elevates it to the surface of the stream as the male flowers are floating past. There are two species, one, Vallisneria spiralis, found in various warm or hot countries, including the south of Europe; the other Australian. The leaves of the first are beautiful objects for the microscope, as they exhibit the movements of the fluids within. V. alternifolia (Roxburgh), a sub-species of V. spiralis, is one of the plants used in India mechanically to supply water to sugar when it is being refined.

Vallisneria Spiralis.
1. Female Flower. 2. Male Flower.

Vāl-lōm-brō'-ŷī-an, s. [Named from Vallombrosa in the Apennines.]

Church History (pl.):

1. A branch of the Cluniacs founded at Vallombrosa in the eleventh century by St. John Gualbert, and confirmed by Pope Victor II. in 1055.

2. A reformed congregation of Benedictine nuns established in 1153.

vāl'-lūm, s. [Latin, from vallus=a stake.] A rampart; a palisaded rampart; a line of entrenchment; specifically, the rampart with which the Romans surrounded their camps. It consisted of two parts, the agger or mound of earth, and the sudes or palisades, which were driven into the ground to secure and strengthen it.

"The vallum or ridged bank, seeming a vicinal way, if not a rampart, crossing the Ikenild-street within two miles of Eueleme and near Nuffield, is called Grimes-ditch."—Warton: Hist. of Kiddington, p. 55.

va-lō'-nī-a, s. [The Italian name for Quercus cægilops. From Mod. Gr. balania, balanidia=the Holm Oak or Scarlet Oak. (Mahn.)]

1. Bot.: A genus of Hydrogastriæ (Lindley), the typical genus of Valoniaceæ (Berkeley). It forms irregular masses of large cells, or repeatedly constricted sacs, which might be mistaken for the eggs of a mollusk.

2. Bot. & Comm.: A commercial name for the large acorn-cups of Quercus cægilops.

va-lō-nī-ā'-čē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. valoni(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: An order of Green-spored Algæ. Frond, consisting of large bladder-like cells filled with a green watery endochrome. Found in the warmer seas. (Berkeley.) vāl'-ōr, vāl'-ōūr, s. [O. Fr. valor, valur, valeur=worth, value, worthiness, from Latin valorem, accus. of valor=worth, courage, from valeo=to be strong, to be worth.]

*1. Value, worth.

"The valour of a peny."—Sir T. More: A Mery Jest.

2. Personal bravery; that quality which enables a man to encounter danger with firmness; courage, especially as regards fighting; intrepidity, prowess.

"His frantic valor had provoked
The death he seemed to wish for from their swords."

Rove: Fair Penitent, v.

*3. A man of valor; a brave man.

"Leading young valors, reckless as myself."

Lytton: Richelieu, i. 1.

vāl'-ōr-oūs, vāl'-ōūr-oūs, a. [Fr. valeureux.] [VALOR.] Brave, courageous, valiant, intrepid.

"Gathering force and courage valorous."

Spenser: F. Q., II. x. 18.

vāl'-ōr-oūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. valorous; -ly.] In a valorous or valiant manner; valiantly, bravely.

"Which they valorously and stoutly performed."—Camden: Hist. of Queen Elizabeth (an. 1579).

Vāl-sāl'-vā, subst. [Antonio Maria Valsalva, an Italian physician and author (1666-1725).] [V.]

¶ Sinuses of Valsalva:

Anat.: Sinuses of the aortic valves.

vāl'-ū-a-ble, a. & s. [Fr.] [VALUE, s.]

A. As adjective:

*1. Capable of being valued, or of having the value estimated, measured, or assessed.

"Commodities are movables valuable by money, the common measure."—Locke: Rate of Interest.

2. Having great value or worth; being of great value or price; precious.

"We found besides what was much more valuable than the rest of the cargo."—Anson: Voyages, bk. ii., ch. iv.

3. Worthy, estimable; deserving of esteem; as, a valuable companion.

B. As subst.: A thing, especially a small thing, of value; a choice or precious article of personal property. (Usually in the plural.)

"Inclining to think that he did steal the valuables."—Thackeray: Roundabout Papers, xxxii.

¶ Valuable signifies fit to be valued; costly, costing much money. Valuable expresses the idea of value directly; costly expresses the same idea indirectly; on the other hand, that which is valuable is only said to be fit or deserving of value; but costly denotes that which is highly valuable, according to the ordinary measure of valuing objects—that is, by the price they bear; hence, the latter expresses the idea much more strongly than the former.

vāl'-ū-a-ble-ness, s. [English valuable; -ness.] The quality or state of being valuable; worth, preciousness.

"The valuableness of my principal aim may atone for running some little hazard of giving offense."—Boyle: Works, iii. 346.

vāl'-ū-a-bleŷ, s. pl. [VALUABLE, B.]

vāl'-ū-ā'-tion, s. [Eng. valu(e); -ation.]

1. The act of valuing.

(1) The act of assessing, estimating, or fixing the value or worth of a thing; the act of fixing the price of a thing; appraisalment.

"The numbering of goods and places, the valuation of goods and substance."—Holinshed: William the Conqueror, (an. 1084).

(2) The act of valuing or esteeming at the true value; estimation.

"Humility in man consists not in denying any gift that is in him, but in a just valuation of it."—Ray: On the Creation.

2. The value or price set on a thing; estimated value or worth.

"Since of your lives you set

So slight a valuation."—Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iv. 4.

*3. Value, worth.

"The mines lie unlabored and of no valuation."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 466.

vāl'-ū-ā-tōr, s. [Eng. valu(e); -ator.] One who assesses or fixes the value of a thing; an appraiser. "I am therefore at a loss what kind of valuators the bishops will make use of."—Swift: Cons. upon Two Bills.

vāl'-ūe, *val-ew, s. [O. Fr. value, prop. fem. of valu, pa. par. of valoir=to be worth; Lat. valeo.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Worth; that property or those properties of a thing which make it useful, estimable, or valuable; the degree of such property or properties; utility, importance.

"An island much superior to Teneriffe both in bulk and value."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1699).

*2. Valor, prowess.

"Therfor the duke him dight, as man of grete value Robert Beleyse with myght, the sege thei wend remue."
Robert de Brunne, p. 100.

3. Account, estimation, importance, worth. (Said of persons.)

"Ye are of more value than many sparrows."—Matthew x. 31.

4. Estimate of the worth of a thing; valuation; appreciation of worth.

"Green talc, upon which they set a high value."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. ii., ch. x.

5. Price equivalent to the intrinsic worth of a thing; equivalent.

"His design was not to pay him the value of his pictures, because they were above any price."—Dryden.

6. Market price; the price for which a thing is sold or which it will fetch; amount obtainable for a thing; as. The value of a thing is what it will fetch.

7. Import, signification; as, the value of a word or phrase.

*8. Esteem, regard.

"My value for him so great."—Burnet.

II. Technically:

1. Music: The relative length or duration of a tone or note; as, A semibreve is of the value of two minims, or four crotchets, or eight quavers, &c.

2. Polit. Econ.: The value of any economic quantity is any other economic quantity for which it can be exchanged. (McLeod.) Worth as estimated by the power of purchasing or being exchanged for other commodities; the command which the possession of a thing gives over purchasable commodities in general. Value differs from price, in that the latter always expresses the value of a thing in relation to money.

"Economists make a distinction between things that have a value in use, and those which have a value in exchange. There are many things—some material, some immaterial—which are very valuable in use, but of little value in exchange; such as air, water, wild flowers, friendship, love, ease. These things, either on account of their abundance, or because they are not susceptible of measurement and transfer, have little value set upon them in the markets of the world, yet they are . . . highly valued for the sake of the enjoyment which the use of them affords. . . . Value in use depends mainly on the feelings of those who use the things so valued. Value in exchange, while largely dependent on these feelings, is also greatly affected by qualities in the things themselves; such as scarcity, difficulty of attainment, susceptibility of measurement and transfer, the labor and skill embodied in them."—Bithell: Counting House Dictionary.

vāl'-ūe, v. t. [VALUE, s.]

*1. To be worth.

"The peace between the French and us not values
The cost."—Shakesp.: Henry VIII., i. 1.

2. To estimate the value or worth of; to rate or assess at a certain price; to appraise.

"If he be poorer than thy estimation, the priest shall value him."—Leviticus xxvii. 8.

3. To estimate or esteem; to rate, whether high or low.

"The king must take it ill;
So slightly valued is his messenger."

Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 2.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

4. To rate at a high price; to hold in high esteem; to set a high value on; to prize; to appreciate highly; to hold in respect and estimation.

"Which of the dukes he values most."

Shakesp.: Lear, i. 1.

*5. To reckon or estimate in regard to numbers or power; to reckon at.

"The queen is valued thirty thousand strong."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., v. 3.

*6. To take account of.

2. Botany (pl.):

(1) The pieces constituting a bract in grasses.

(2) The two longitudinal portions of an anther after dehiscence of the normal kind has taken place.

(3) The portions into which certain fruits separate after dehiscence, spec. the divisions of a capsule.

3. Mach. A lid, cover, leaf, ball, box, disc, plug, or plate, lifting, oscillating, rotating, or sliding in connection with a port or aperture, so as to permit or prevent the passage of a fluid through the port which it guards. Valves are of several classes, and the most important are described in this Dictionary under their distinctive names, as, Cup-valve, Safety-valve (q. v.), &c.

4. Zoöl.: A portion of a shell complete in itself. In a great many of the Mollusca proper the shell consists of a single piece, and they are called Univalves. In many others the shell consists of two separate plates or valves, and these are called Bivalves. In others, again, as in the Chiton, the shell consists of more than two pieces, and is said to be multivalve. Most, however, of the multivalve shells of older writers are in reality referable to the Cirripedia. (Nicholson.)

valve-bucket, s. A bucket provided with a valve; the bucket or sucker of a pump.

valve-cage, s. [CAGE, s., II. 2.]

valve-cock, s.

Mach.: A form of faucet in which the closure of the passage is by a valve on a seat.

valve-coupling, s.

Mach.: A pipe-coupling which includes a valve-plate.

valve-gear, s.

Steam-eng.: The system of parts by which a valve is worked.

valve-seat, s. [SEAT, s., II. 1.]

valve-shell, s. [VALVATA.]

valve-stem, s. [STEM, s., II. 2.]

valve-tailed bat, s.

Zoöl.: Didelidurus albus, a native of Brazil. It is remarkable for its whitish color, and the presence of a curious horny case, composed of two parts, which covers the extremity of the tail, and is attached to the upper surface of the interfemoral membrane, whence its popular and generic names.

valved, a. [Eng. valv(e); -ed.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Having valves or hinges; composed of valves.

2. Bot.: Consisting of valves or seed-cells; valvular.

2. To improvise a musical accompaniment to.

"As soon as I could get in to vamp the tunes on the banjo a little."—Mayhew: London Labor and London Poor, iii. 201.

B. Intrans.: To improvise musical accompaniments.

"How to vamp to songs, chords, &c."—Fall Mall Gazette.

vāmp (2), v. i. [Etym. doubtful.] To travel, to proceed; to move forward.

vāmp'-ēr, s. [Eng. vamp (1), v.; -er.]

1. One who vamps; one who patches or pieces old things with something new.

2. One who vamps musical accompaniments.

vām'-pēr, v. i. [A nasalized form of vapor (q. v.).] To vapor or swagger. (Scotch.)

vām'-pire, s. & a. [Fr., from Ger. vampyr, from Serv. vampir, vampira; Pol. upior; Russ. upir=a vampire.]

A. As substantive:

I. Literally:

1. A kind of nocturnal demon, supposed to eat out the hearts and souls or suck the blood of its victims. This superstition had its rise in the desire of savage animism to account for the fact that certain patients are seen becoming, day by day, without any apparent cause, thin, weak, and bloodless, and is found among the Karens, in Polynesia, and in the Malay Peninsula. But it is in Slavonia and Hungary that these demon bloodsuckers have their special home, and it is from these countries that their name of "vampire" is derived. According to Tylor, there are two theories of vampirism. The first is, that the soul of a living man, usually a sorcerer, leaves its own body and goes forth, in the visible shape of a straw or a piece of fluff, and attacks its sleeping victim. Should the sleeper awake and clutch the embodied soul, he may through it have his revenge by maltreating or destroying its bodily owner. The second theory is that the soul of a dead man goes out from its buried corpse to suck the blood of living men. The corpse, thus supplied by its returning soul with blood, is believed to remain unnaturally fresh, supple, and ruddy; and, accordingly the means of detecting a vampire is to open the grave, when the reanimated corpse will be found to bleed when cut, and even to move and shriek. One way to lay a vampire is to stake down the corpse (as with suicides, and with the same intention); but the more effectual plan is to behead and burn it. (Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ch. xv.)

"Vampires are not mere creations of groundless fancy, but causes conceived in spiritual form to account for specific facts of wasting disease."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 122.

2. The same as VAMPIRE-BAT (q. v.).

II. Fig.: One who preys on others; an extortioner or bloodsucker.

"There are the vampires of the public and riflers of the kingdom."—Forman: On Revol. in 1688 (1741), p. 11.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a vampire; resembling a vampire in character; hence, fig., blood-sucking, extortionate.

"There is a whole literature of hideous vampire stories, which the reader will find elaborately discussed in Calmet."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 192.

vampire-bat, s.

Zoölogy:

*1. A name formerly given to Vampyrus spectrum.

"The vampire-bat is a native of Southern America, and is spread over a large extent of country. It is not a very large animal, the length of the body and tail being only six inches, or perhaps seven in very large specimens, and the spread of wings two feet or rather more. The color of the vampire's fur is a mouse tint, with a shade of brown."—Wood: Illus. Nat. Hist., i. 116.

2. Any species of the group Desmodontes, consisting of two genera, each represented by a single species. They differ from all other bats in the character of dentition, the upper incisors being very large, trenchant, and occupying the whole space between the canines; premolars very narrow, with sharp-edged longitudinal crowns; molars rudimentary or none; oesophagus very narrow; cardiac extremity of stomach greatly elongated, forming a long, narrow cæcum. (Proc. Zool. Soc., 1865, p. 389.) The species are sanguivorous, and cling by their extremities to the body of the animal whose blood they may be sucking.

"The Vampire Bat is often the cause of much trouble by biting the horses on their withers. The injury is generally not so much owing to the loss of blood, as to the inflammation which the pressure of the saddle afterward produces. The whole circumstances have lately been doubted in England. I was therefore fortunate in being present when one (Desmodus d'orbigny, Wat.) was actually caught on a horse's back. We were bivouacking late one evening near Coquimbo, in Chili, when my servant, noticing that one of the horses was very restive, went to see what was the matter, and, fancying he could detect something, suddenly put his hand on the beast's withers, and secured the Vampire."—Darwin: Naturalist's Voyage (ed. 1838), p. 22.

vām'-pīr-īsm, vām'-pyr-īsm (yr as īr), subst. [Eng. vampir(e); -ism.]

I. Literally:

1. Belief in the existence of vampires; the theory of the existence of vampires.

"The horrible theory of vampirism is that persons who have been victims of it pass, after death, from the passive into the active state, and become vampires in their turn."—London Daily Telegraph.

2. The action of a vampire; blood-sucking.

II. Fig.: The practice of extortion, or preying on others.

"Treason, delusion, vampirism, scoundrelism."—Carlyle: French Revol., pt. ii., bk. iii., ch. ii.

vām'-plāte, vam-plet, vam-palt, subst. [Fr. avant-plat=front or fore-plate.] [VAMBRACE.]

Old Arm.: A singular shield of metal, which was affixed to the lance of the armed knight in tilts and tourneys as a guard or shield over the hand. (Fairholt.) By some authorities considered synonymous with vambrace (q. v.).

"Amphialus was run through the vamplate."—Sidney: Arcadia, bk. iii.

vām-pŷr'-i, s. pl. [VAMPIRUS.]

Zoöl.: A group of Bats, sub-family Phyllostominae, with thirteen genera, from the Neotropical region. Muzzle long and narrow in front; distance between the eyes generally less than distance from the eye to extremity of muzzle; nose-leaf well developed, horse-shoe-shaped in front, lanceolate behind; interfemoral membrane well-developed; tail generally distinct. Nearly all the species appear to be insectivorous, so that the name applied to this group cannot be considered indicative of their habits. A few, if not all, probably supplement their insect diet with fruit.

vām-pŷr'-ōps, s. [Mod. Lat. vampyr(us), and Gr. ops=the countenance.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Stenodermata, with three species, from the Mexican and Brazilian sub-regions.

vām-pŷr'-ūs, s. [A name suggested to Geoffroy, and adopted by Spix, from the supposed blood-sucking habits of the genus.]

Zoölogy: The type-genus of the group Vampyri (q. v.), with two species, from the Neotropical region. There are two species: Vampyrus spectrum, about eight inches long, commonly called the Vampire-bat, and erroneously said to be sanguivorous, the observations of modern travelers having shown that it feeds on fruit and insects; and V. auritus, a somewhat smaller bat.

va-mure', s. [VANTMURE.]

vān (1), s. [An abbrev. of vanguard, vantguard, vauntguard, or avant-garde; from O. Fr. avant-warde, avant-garde=the vanguard of an army, from avant (Lat. abante)=from in front, and garde=ground.]

*1. The front generally.

"Sir Roger, you shall have the van."

Béaum. & Flet.: Scornful Lady, v.

2. The front of an army; the front line or foremost division of a fleet, either sailing or drawn up in line of battle.

"I fight conspicuous in the van of war."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xiii. 350.

vān (2), vanne, s. [Fr. van, from Lat. vannum, accus. of vannus=a fan.] [FAN, s.]

*1. A fan or other contrivance for winnowing grain.

"The other token of their ignorance of the sea was an oar; they call it a corn van."—Broome: On the Odyssey.

2. A shovel used in sifting ore. A peculiar rocking motion, called Vanning, is given to the shovel, separating the ore powder into grades of varying gravity.

*3. A wing.

"[They] . . . with hideous flapping vans

Clove the thick air, and glared with great round eyes."

Blackie: Lays of Highlands, p. 36.

vān (3), s. [An abbrev. of caravan (q. v.).]

1. A large covered wagon or carriage; a caravan.

2. A kind of vehicle, sometimes open and sometimes shut, used by tradesmen and others for carrying light goods, &c.

3. A carriage attached to a railway train for carrying passengers' luggage, parcels, &c., and for the accommodation of the guard. (Eng.)

vān (1), vanne, v. t. [Fr. vanner.] [VAN (2), s.]

1. Ord. Lang.: To winnow, to fan. (Cotgrave.)

"The corn which in vanning lieth lowest is the best."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 671.

2. Min.: To cleanse, as a small portion of ore, by means of a shovel. [VAN (2), s., 2.]

vān (2), v. t. [VAN (3), s.] To carry, convey, or transport in a vān.

vān'-ā-dāte, s. [Eng. vanad(ic); suff. -ate.]

Chem. & Min.: A salt of vanadic acid (q. v.).

¶ Vanadate of Copper=Volborthite; Vanadate of Lead=Descloizite, Vanadinite; Vanadate of Lead and Copper=Chileite; Vanadate of Lead and Zinc=Dechenite, Eusynchite; Vanadate of Lime and Copper=Lime-volborthite.

vā-nād'-ic, a. [English vanad(ium); -ic.] Contained in or derived from vanadium (q. v.).

Chem.: HVO_3 . Hydrated vanadic oxide. Obtained by heating a solution of an anhydrovanadate of an alkali metal. It forms a bulky flocculent precipitate, which dries up to a light brown red powder. It is a weak acid, and combines more readily with bases than with acids forming vanadates.

vanadic-ocher, s.

Mineral.: A pulverulent mineral found incrusting native copper at the Cliff Mine, Lake Superior. Composition: Vanadic acid, V_2O_5 .

vān'-ā-dīn, s. [VANADIUM.]

vanadin-augite, s.

Min.: The same as LAVROFFITE (q. v.).

vanadin-bronzite, s.

Min.: A bronzite said to contain vanadic acid.

vān-ād'-in-ite, subst. [Eng. vanadi(um); n connect., and suff. -ite (Min); Ger. vanadinit, vanadinbleierz, vanadinbleispath.]

Mineral.: A mineral occurring mostly in simple hexagonal prisms, but sometimes with other forms. Hardness, 2.7-3; specific gravity 6.6623-7.23; luster, resinous; color, light brownish-yellow, straw yellow, reddish-brown; bright red; streak, white to yellowish; sub-translucent to opaque; fracture, uneven, brittle. Composition: Vanadate and chloride of lead, with the formula $3Pb_3(VO_4)_2 + PbCl_2$. Isomorphous with pyromorphite. Recently found in beautiful crystals of a bright red color in Colorado.

vān-ād'-i-ō-lite, s. [Eng. vanadi(um); o connect., and Gr. lithos=a stone.]

Mineral.: A somewhat doubtful mineral species; occurs in small crystals with lavroffite at Sludianka, Lake Baikal, Asiatic Russia. Specific gravity 3.96; color, dark-green to black; luster, vitreous. Hermann's analysis yielded silica, 15.61; alumina, 1.10; protoxide of iron, 1.40; lime, 34.43; magnesia, 2.61; vanadic acid, 44.85=100, the formula for which he gives as $3ROSiO_2 + 6CaO, (VO_4 + 2VO_5)$.

vān'-ā-dīte, s. [VANADINITE.]

vā-nā'-dī-ūm, s. [Latinized from Vanadis, a name of the Scandinavian goddess Freyja, from the fact of its discovery in Swedish iron.]

Chem.: A metallic pentad element, discovered by Sefström in 1830, in the refinery slag of the iron ores of Taberg, in Sweden; symbol, V; atomic weight, 51.2. It is extracted from the finely-pulverized slag by deflagrating with niter and sodic carbonate, digesting the fused mass with a saturated solution of sal-ammoniac, and igniting the product in an open vessel. On heating the mass with potassium, and washing with water, pure vanadium is obtained as a brilliant metallic powder, having a silver-white luster. It is non-volatile, does not tarnish in the air, burns vividly when heated in oxygen, is insoluble in hydrochloric acid, dissolves slowly in hydrofluoric acid, but very rapidly in nitric acid, forming a blue solution. It forms five oxides, analogous to the oxides of nitrogen, and three chlorides, viz., the dichloride, the trichloride, and the tetrachloride.

Chem.: Vanadium forms four oxides: (1) Vanadium dioxide, V_2O_2 , is obtained by reducing either of the higher oxides with potassium. It forms a light-gray glittering powder, having a specific gravity of 3.64, and is insoluble in sulphuric and hydrochloric acids. (2) Vanadium trioxide, V_2O_3 , is obtained by igniting the pentoxide in hydrogen gas. It is a black powder, with an almost metallic luster, and is insoluble in acids. (3) Vanadium tetroxide, V_2O_4 , is obtained by allowing the trioxide to absorb oxygen at ordinary temperatures, forming blue shining crystals. It is soluble in acids, and combines with bases forming vanadites, none of which is of any importance. (4) Vanadium pentoxide, V_2O_5 , is obtained by igniting vanadate of ammonium in an open platinum crucible. It has a more or less reddish-yellow color, is tasteless, and dissolves in the stronger acids, forming red or yellow solutions.

vān'-ā-dōūs, a. [Mod. Lat. vanad(ium); Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Of or pertaining to vanadium.

vān'-cōu'-rī-ēr, vant-cur-reur, van-currier, s. [Fr. avant-courrier, avant-coureur, from avant (Latin abante)=from in front, and courrier, coureur=a runner, a courier (q. v.).] An avant-courrier, a precursor.

vān'-dā, subst. [Sansk. vānda=a parasitic plant, generally considered to be of this genus, but regarded by Prof. Watt as Loranthus longiflorus.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Vandee (q. v.). Leaves distichous, coriaceous, from a few inches to two feet in length. Flowers in racemes, beautifully colored—blue, red, yellow, brown, &c.—and highly fragrant. They occur in India, China, the Moluccas, &c., as parasites upon trees in dense forests, from which they have been introduced into hot-houses in America and Europe. They may be attached to a piece of wood or a wire-basket, as their nourishment is derived from the atmosphere and not from the soil. More than twenty species are known. The fragrant root of Vanda roxburghii is given by Hindu doctors in various forms in rheumatism. It also enters into the composition of several medicinal oils.

Vanda Cærulescens.

Vān'-dāl, s. & a. [Lat. Vandalus=a Vandal, one of the tribe of Vandali, lit.=the wanderers; cogn. with Eng. wander (q. v.).]

A. As substantive:

1. Lit.: One of a Teutonic race, originally inhabiting the southern shore of the Baltic. They began to be troublesome to the Romans A. D. 160. In A. D. 410 they mastered Spain in conjunction with the Alani and Suevi, and received for their share Vandalia (Andalusia). In A. D. 429 they crossed into Africa under Genseric, and not only obtained possession of Byzacium, Gætulia, and part of Numidia, but crossed over into Italy (A. D. 455), and plundered Rome. After the death of Genseric the Vandal power declined.

2. Fig.: One who willfully or ignorantly destroys or disfigures any work of art, literature, or the like.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or resembling the Vandals; Vandalic.

Vān-dāl'-ic, a. [Eng. Vandal; -ic.] Of or pertaining to or resembling the Vandals; hence, rude, barbarous, ferocious, hostile to the arts and sciences.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

Văn'-dal-izm, s. [English Vandal; -ism.] The spirit, practice, or conduct of the Vandals; willful or ignorant destruction of works or monuments of art and literature; hostility to or irreverence for art and literature; disregard for what is beautiful or venerable.

"The removal of the stone sea-horses which disfigure the pediment will be met with a cry of Vandalism."—London Daily Telegraph.

văn'-dē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vand(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Orchidaceæ; parasitic on terrestrial plants, with or without a stem, with a terminal or rarely a dorsal anther, the pollen cohering in definite waxy masses; a distinct caudicle united to a stigmatic gland. Found in Asia and America. Families: Sarcanthidæ, Cryptochilidæ, Pachyphylidæ, Maxillaridæ, Catasetidæ, Ionopsidæ, and Calanthidæ.

văn-dēl'-lī-a, s. [Named after Dominico Vandelli, professor of botany at Lisbon, who died about 1815.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Linderniæ, found in Southern Asia, South America, &c. Flowers axillary, tufted, calyx tubular or campanulate, five-toothed; upper lip of the corolla shorter than the lower one; anthers coherent; fruit a globose capsule, two-valved, with many seeds. Vandellia diffusa, a native of Guiana, where it is called by the Dutch Bitter-blane, is an antibilious emetic and febrifuge given in malignant fevers and dysentery.

2. Ichthy.: [STEGOPHILUS.]

văn-dyke, văn-dyck, subst. & adj. [After the painter Vandyke (1599-1641).]

A. As subst.: A pointed collar of lace or sewed work worn by both sexes during the reign of Charles I., of England, and to be seen in portraits painted by Vandyke.

"Laced handkerchiefs, resembling the large falling band worn by the men, were in fashion among the ladies. This article of dress has been lately revived, and called a Vandyck."—Granger: Biog. Hist. Chas. I.

B. As adj.: Applied to the style of dress in which Vandyke painted his portraits.

vandyke-brown, s. A pigment obtained from a kind of peat or bog-earth of a fine, deep, semi-transparent brown color. It owes its name and reputation to the supposition that it was the brown used by Vandyke in his pictures.

văn-dyke, văn-dyck, v. t. [VANDYKE, s.] To scallop the edge of, as a piece of dress, after the manner of a Vandyke collar.

"The edges are best scalloped or vandycked, while the foundation ought to be silk."—London Daily Telegraph.

vâne, a. [VAIN.]

vâne, fane, s. [A. S. fana=a small flag; cogn. with Dat. vaun; Icel. fani; Dan. fane; Sw. & Goth. fana; M. H. Ger. fano; Ger. fahne; Lat. pannus=a piece of cloth; Gr. pēnos=the woof.]

1. A contrivance attached to an axis, and having a surface exposed to a moving current of fluid, so as to be actuated thereby. A vane indicates direction or rate of motion, the amount of fluid passing, or it may be used to obtain power; specifically—

(1) A weather-cock, flag, or arrow, or other thin object, which points in the direction whence the wind proceeds. [DOG-VANE.]

(2) The arm of a wind-mill; the wing of a fanning-mill.

(3) The blade of a screw-propeller and the like.

*2. A flag carried by a knight in a tournament.

3. The broad part of a feather on either side of the shaft; the web.

4. A cross-piece on a leveling-staff (q. v.).

5. The sight of a quadrant or similar instrument for the measurement of angles.

vā-nēl'-lūs, s. [The name was formerly spelled vannellus, as the dimin. from Lat. vannus = a fan. (Charleton: Exercitationes, in Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), iii. 283, Note †.)]

Ornith.: A genus of Charadriidæ (or, if that family is divided, of Charadriinæ), with three species, from Palearctic and Neotropical regions. Bill straight, shorter than head, slightly compressed, points horny and hard; nasal groove wide, nostrils basal, linear, in the membrane of nasal groove; legs slender, lower part naked; tarsi reticulated behind, scutellated in front; feet four-toed, three before, united at the base by a membrane, hind toe very short, articulated on tarsus; wings large, tuberculated or spurred in front of the carpal joint; third and fourth quill-feathers longest. Vanellus cristatus is the common Lapwing.

vā-nēs'-sā, s. [Modern Lat., from Gr. Phanēs=a mystic divinity in the Orphic rites.]

1. Entom.: The typical genus of the sub-family Vanessinæ, or Vanessidi. Antennæ with the club somewhat prolonged; fore wings with a distinct projection in the hind margin above the middle, the inner margin nearly straight; hind wings generally with a short projection in the hind margin. Caterpillars spiny. The best known species are: Vanessa atalanta (= Pyrameis atalanta, Newman), the Red Admiral [ADMIRAL, C. 1]; V. io, the Peacock Butterfly (q. v.); V. antiopa, the White-bordered Butterfly (q. v.), called also the Camberwell Beauty; V. polychloros, the Large, and V. urticae, the Small Tortoiseshell. [TORTOISESHELL BUTTERFLY.] Sometimes the Comma Butterfly, Grapta C. album, is called Vanessa C. album, and ranked as a sixth species. Darwin (Descent of Man, ed. 2d, p. 311) notes the resemblance of the closed wings of some species to the bark of trees; but, in spite of their protective coloring, they are palatable to birds and lizards (Proc. Zool. Soc., 1887, p. 263).

2. Palæont.: There is a species, Vanessa pluto, in the Oligocene of Radoboj, in Croatia. The pattern of the wing has escaped obliteration. Called also Mylothritis pluto, and supposed by some to belong to the Pierinæ.

văn-ēs-sī'-næ, vā-nēs'-sī-dī, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vanness(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ, or masc. -idi.]

Entom.: Angle-wings; a sub-family of Nymphalidæ. Wings angled; caterpillar spiny, of uniform thickness throughout, often living gregariously; chrysalis angulated, head cased, the points sharp and salient.

văn'-fōsse, s. [Fr. avant=before, and fosse (Lat. fossa)=a ditch.]

Fort.: A ditch on the outside of the counterscarp.

văng, s. [Dut. vangen; Ger. fangen; Eng. fang =to catch.] [FANG, v.]

Naut.: A rope, one on each side, to steady laterally the peak of a gaff. It is usually a pendant, with a twofold purchase.

văng, v. t. & i. [Etym. doubtful.]

A. Trans.: To receive, to earn; to catch, to throw. (Halliwell.)

B. Intrans.: To answer for a person at the baptismal font. (Prov. Eng.) (Ray.)

văn'-gā, s. [Latinized from native name.]

Ornith.: A genus of Laniidæ (or, if that family is divided, of Thamnophilinæ), with four species, from Madagascar. Bill moderate, straight, compressed, keeled, with tip curved; angle of mouth armed with bristles; nostrils lateral, basal, rounded; tail rather long, graduated. The plumage, which is green-black and pure white, is very conspicuous.

văn'-gēē, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Naut.: A contrivance for working the pumps of a ship by means of a barrel and crank-breaks.

văn'-glō, văn'-glōe, s. [See def.]

Bot.: A West Indian name for Sesamum orientale. [TEEL.]

văn'-guard (ua as a), vant-guard, vaunt-guard, van-warde, vant-warde, vaunt-warde, vawne-warde, s. [O. Fr. avantgarde, avantwarde, from avant (Lat. abante) =from in front, and garde, warde=guard.] The troops who march in the front or van of an army; the advance guard; the van.

"The front of the French vanguard makes Upon the English."

Drayton: Battle of Agincourt.

văn'-guēr'-ī-a, s. [From vua-vanga, or vua-vanguer, the Madagascar name of one species.]

Bot.: A genus of Guettardiæ. Shrubs, having the limb of the calyx minutely toothed; the corolla campanulate, with a hairy throat; stamens five, filaments short; fruit succulent, resembling an apple, with five seeds. Natives of Madagascar and India. Vangueria edulis, a small tree, a native of Madagascar, has edible fruit; it has, in consequence, been introduced into India. V. spinosa, a large, thorny shrub, wild in eastern Bengal, Burmah, Pegu, and Tenasserim, has a round, cherry-like fruit, yellow when ripe, which is eaten by the Hindus.

vā-nīl'-lā, s. [Span. vaynilla, dimin. of vayna=a knife, a scissors-case. So named because the pod, which is long and cylindrical, is like the sheath of a knife.]

Vanessa Io.

Bot.: The typical genus of Vanillidæ. Climbing orchids, not parasitic. Stem square; leaves fleshy, articulated at the base; pollen masses two, bilobed and granular. Natives of tropical Asia and America. Vanilla claviculata is fragrant and bitter; its leaves are used in the West Indies as an anti-syphilitic and a vulnerary. The dried fruit of V. planifolia and other species constitutes the vanilla of commerce, an agreeable aromatic used in the manufacture of chocolate, various liqueurs, and confectionery. The plant is cultivated for this purpose in Mexico.

Vanilla Aromatica.

Showing Flower and Seed-vessels.

vā-nīl'e, s. [Fr.] Vanilla.

"You flavor everything: you are the vanille of society."—Sydney Smith: Works, p. 329.

vā-nīl'-lic, a. [English vanill(ine); -ic.] Contained in or derived from vanilline (q. v.).

vanillic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_5O_4=CO:OH:OCH_3:OH$. A crystalline substance obtained by the oxidation of vanilline. It forms white plates, which melt at 211-12°, and sublime at a higher temperature.

vā-nīl'-lī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vanill(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Botany: A family of Orchids, tribe Arethuseæ. Lindley formerly made it a distinct order, Vanillaceæ, on account of its succulent, valveless fruit, its seeds not having the testa of other Orchidaceæ, its habit, and its aromatic properties.

vā-nīl'-line, s. [Eng. vanill(a); -ine.]

Chem.: $C_8H_8O_3=\frac{CH_3O}{H}O.C_6H_3.CO.H$. The methyl ether of protocatechuic aldehyde, found in crystals, in vanilla pods, from which it may be extracted by alcohol. It crystallizes in long, hard needles, slightly soluble in cold water, very soluble in boiling water and in alcohol, melts at 80-81°, and sublimes at 150°. Fused with potassic hydrate it is converted into protocatechuic acid.

vā-nīl'-lōes, s. [VANILLA.]

Bot., &c.: A bastard kind of vanilla, obtained from Vanilla pompona.

vā-nīl'-ō-quēnce, s. [Eng. vaniloquen(t); -ce.] Idle, foolish, or vain talk.

vā-nīl'-ō-quēt, a. [Lat. vanus=vain, empty, and loquens, pr. par. of loquor=to speak.] Talking idly or foolishly.

văn'-ish, van-iss-en, van-shen, van-ysch, verb i. [From Latin vanesco=to vanish (lit.=to become empty, from vanus=empty), through an O. Fr. vanir (not found), pr. par. vanissant. Cf. punish, polish, furnish, &c.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To pass from a visible to an invisible state; to disappear; to become imperceptible; to lose perceptible existence.

"The heavens shall vanish away like smoke."—Isaiah ii. 6.

2. To pass away from the sight or out of view; to pass beyond the limits of vision; as, a ship vanishes from the sight of spectators on the land.

*3. To pass away; to be annihilated or lost.

"Picked from the worm-holes of long vanish'd days." Shakesp.: Henry V., ii. 4.

*4. To issue; to be given off or out, as breath.

II. Math.: To become evanescent, like a mathematical quantity when its arithmetical value is nothing. [VANISHING-FRACTION.]

văn'-ish, s. [VANISH, v.]

Elocution: A sound that gradually becomes weaker till it ceases.

văn'-ish-īng, pr. par. & a. [VANISH, v.] vanishing-fraction, s.

Math.: A fraction which reduces to the form of $\frac{a}{a}$ for a particular value of the variable which enters it, in consequence of the existence of a common factor in both terms of the fraction, which factor becomes 0 for this particular value of the variable.

Perspective: An indefinitely extended line supposed to be drawn on a level with the eye, parallel to the horizon. In the vanishing-line the vanishing points are situated.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, thiç; sin, aç; expect, çenophon, exist. ph = f. -clan, -tian = shæn. -tion, -sion = shün; tion, -çion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

vanishing-stress, s.

Elocution: Stress of voice upon the closing portion of a syllable. (Rush, in Goodrich & Porter.)

văn'-ish-mënt, s. [English vanish, v.; -ment.] A vanishing.

Văn'-istş, s. pl. [See def.]

Church Hist.: The followers of Sir Henry Vane, an Antinomian, and Governor of New England in 1636.

văn'-i-tied, *văn'-i-týed, a. [Eng. vanity; -ed.] Affected with vanity.

"Your foolish, your cow-vanity'd Lovelace."—Richardson: Clarissa, iv. 86.

văn'-i-tý, *van-i-te, *van-i-tie, *van-y-tee, s. [Fr. vanité, from Lat. vanitatem, accus. of vanitas = emptiness, worthlessness, from vanus = empty, vain (q. v.).]

1. The quality or state of being empty, vain, or worthless; worthlessness, futility, emptiness, unsubstantiality, unreality, unrealness, illusion.

"Vanity of vanity, saith the Preacher, all is vanity."—Eccles. i. 2.

*2. Groundlessness, falseness; want of grounds or foundation.

3. The quality or state of being vain or elated with a high opinion of one's own accomplishments or achievements, or with things more showy than valuable; empty pride inspired by an overweening conceit of one's personal attainments or decorations, and causing its possessor to be morbidly anxious for the notice, admiration, and applause of others; conceit. [PRIDE, ¶.]

"Vanity is that species of pride, which, while it presumes upon a degree of superiority in some particular articles, fondly courts the applause of every one within its sphere of action, seeking every occasion to display some talent or some supposed excellence."—Cogan: On the Passions.

4. Ostentation; ambitious or ostentatious display; vainglory, vaunting, pride, conceit.

"The ground-work thereof is true, however they, through vanity, whilst they would not seem to be ignorant, do thereupon build many forged histories of their own antiquity."—Spenser: State of Ireland.

5. That which is vain, empty, unreal, or unsubstantial; as—

(1) Empty pleasure, vain pursuit, idle show, unreality.

"All their exhortations were to set light of the things in this world, to count riches and honors vanitie."—Hooker: Eccles. Pol., Pref., § 8.

(2) Fruitless desire or endeavor; effort which produces no result.

(3) An empty or vain conceit; a trifle.

"Some vanity of mine art."—Shakesp.: Tempest, iv.

(4) Script.: An idol (Jer. xviii. 15). In this sense it is generally used in the plural.

"Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain, or can the heavens give showers. Art thou not he, O Lord, our God?"—Jer. xiv. 22. (Cf. also Deut. xxxii. 21; 1 Kings xvi. 13, 26; Jer. viii. 19.)

*6. A character in the old moralities.

"You . . . take vanity the puppet's part."—Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 2.

văn'-nër, s. [Eng. van (1), s.; -er.] A van horse. (Eng.)

"Twenty-five Welsh cobs, cabbars, and vanners."—Referee, April 8, 1888.

văn-nĩng, s. [VAN (2), v.]

văn'-quish, *ven-kis-en, *ven-kus-en, *ven-quish-en, *ven-quis-en, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. veinquir (pr. par. veinquissant), a collateral form of veindre (Fr. vaincre, pa. t. vanquis, subj. que je vainquise), from Lat. vinco=to conquer.]

A. Transitive:

1. To conquer; to overcome or subdue in battle, as an enemy.

"The enemies beaten on all sides, and in so many sorts, with artillery were put backe, and vanquished."—Hackluyt: Voyages, ii. 84.

*2. To overcome or defeat in any contest, as in an argument.

*3. To confute, to refute; to prove erroneous or unfounded; to upset.

"This bold assertion has been fully vanquished in a late reply to the Bishop of Meaux's treatise."—Atterbury.

*4. To overpower, to prostrate.

"Sorrow and grief have vanquished all my powers."—Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., ii. 1.

*5. To overpower the peculiar virtue or properties of; to destroy; to render inert or inefficacious; to neutralize.

B. Intrans.: To overcome, to conquer; to get the better.

"If thou vanquishest thy words are true."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., i. 2.

¶ For the difference between to vanquish and to conquer, see CONQUER.

văn'-quish-ër, s. [Eng. vanquish, v.; -er.] One who or that which vanquishes; a conqueror.

"I am alone the vanquisher of time."

Drayton: Robert Duke of Normandy.

văn'-quish-mënt, s. [Eng. vanquish, v.; -ment.] The act of vanquishing; the state of being vanquished.

"Yet he opposes three daies pestilence to seven years famine and three moneths vanquishment."—Bp. Hall: Balm of Gilead, § 7.

văn'-sire, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: Herpestes galera; a small, weasel-like animal, from Madagascar and the Isle of France. The color is deep-brown speckled with yellow, the tail of equal thickness throughout.

vânt, v. i. [VAUNT.] To vaunt, to boast.

van'-tage (age as ig), vaunt-age, subst. [Fr. avantage=an advantage (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Advantage, gain, profit.

"Not for renouwe or vauntage sake, but for the loue of his name."—Udall: Hebrues vi.

2. Advantage; the being in a better state or condition for action or defense than another; vantage-ground; condition favorable to success.

"He sought to get the vantage."—North: Plutarch, p. 152.

*3. Opportunity, convenience.

"At your meetest vantage of the time."

Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 5.

II. Lawn Tennis: A term used for the point following the stage when each player has won three points. Probably called advantage, and often used attributively as in vantage game or set.

"Advantage sets are played—i. e., if each player wins five games, the set is continued until one player wins two games consecutively. 'Vantage all' is a barbarous term, introduced by some genius who does not understand language, to express the fact that the players agree to decide the set by the best of three games, after arriving at five games all. This arrangement is not allowed in matches where advantage sets are played. The term 'vantage all' is absurd, as both players cannot win advantage at the same time. The correct expression is 'games all'."—Field, Dec. 24, 1887.

*¶ (1) Of vantage, To the vantage: To boot; besides.

"Yes, a dozen; and as many

To the vantage, as would store the world."

Shakesp.: Othello, iv. 3.

(2) To get vantage of: To get the better of.

"If they get ground and vantage of the king."

Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., ii. 3.

van'-tage (age as ig), v. t. [Fr. avantager.] To profit, to advantage.

"The injuries that to myself I do Doing thee vantage, double vantage me."

Shakesp.: Sonnet 88.

vantage-ground, s. Superiority of position or place; a place or condition which gives one an advantage over another.

"Upon the steadfast vantage-ground of truth."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. viii.

†vantage-loaf, subst. The thirteenth loaf in a baker's dozen. (Brewer.)

văn-ũx'-ëm-ite, s. [After Mr. Vanuxem; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A white, massive mineral substance, occurring with zinc ores at Sterling Hill, New Jersey. Hardness, 2.5-3; specific gravity, 2.5. An analysis gave: Silica, 35.64; alumina, 11.70; protoxide of zinc, 32.48-36.0; water, 14.80-19.88. As Dana points out, this cannot be regarded as a distinct species, but rather as a mixture of clay with hydrated silicate of zinc.

văn'-ward, a. [Eng. van, s.; -ward.] Of, pertaining to, or situated in the van or front.

"The vanward frontier."—De Quincey. (Annandale.)

văn'-zeř, s. [WANZEY.]

văp, *vap̃pe, s. [Lat. vappa=wine that has lost its flavor; vapid or pallid wine; allied to vapor=vapor.] Wine that has become vapid or dead; vapid, flat, or insipid liquor.

"The dead lees and vap of wine."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. ii., ch. iii.

văp'-id, a. [Lat. vapidus, from vappa=vapid or pallid wine; Fr. vapide.]

*1. Corrupt, foul.

"A kind of vapid atmosphere about that planet."—Glanvill: Essays, No. vii.

2. Having lost its life and spirit; dead, flat, insipid.

"Thy vines let feed awhile

On the fat refuse; lest too soon disjoined,

From spritely it to sharp or vapid change."

Philips. (Todd.)

3. Dull, spiritless; wanting in life or spirit; flat.

"A cheap, bloodless reformation, a guiltless liberty, appear flat and vapid to their taste."—Burke: French Revolution.

vă-pid'-i-tý, s. [Eng. vapid; -ity.] The quality or state of being vapid; vapidness.

"After the violent ferment in the nation, a remarkable deadness and vapidity has succeeded."—Burke: To Mr. Shackleton, July 31, 1771.

văp'-id-lý, adv. [Eng. vapid; -ly.] In a vapid manner.

văp'-id-něss, s. [Eng. vapid; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being vapid, flat, dead, or insipid; flatness, deadness; as, the vapidity of beer.

2. Dullness, flatness; want of life or spirit; mawkishness.

vă-por, va'-pour, *wa-pure, s. [Fr. vapeur, from Lat. vaporem, accus. of vapor=vapor; Sp. A. vapor; Ital. vapore.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II.

(2) Any visible diffused substance floating in the atmosphere and impairing its transparency, as fog or mist; hazy matter.

"From the damp earth impervious vapors rise."

Pope: Statius; Thebaid, l. 486.

* (3) Wind, flatulence.

"Ointments, if laid on anything thick, by stopping up the pores, shut in the vapors, and send them to the head extremely."—Bacon.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Something unsubstantial, fleeting, or transitory; unreal fancy; vain imagination.

"He hath the grace of hope, though it be clouded over with a melancholy vapor."—Hammond.

* (2) (Pl.): A hectoring or bullying style of conversation or mode of behavior, indulged in by swaggers for the purpose of bringing about a real or mock quarrel, consisting in flatly contradicting whatever was said by a speaker, even if the bully had granted what was asserted just before.

"They are at it still, sir; this they call vapors."—Ben Jonson: Bartholomew Fair, iv. 3.

* (3) (Pl.): A disease of nervous debility, in which a variety of strange images float in the brain, or appear as if real; hence, hypochondriacal affections; depression of spirits; dejection, spleen; the blues.

II. Physics: An æriform fluid into which some volatile substance is changed by the action of heat. Vapor is essentially the same as gas, but the word vapor is conventionally limited to the gaseous state of a body which is liquid or solid at ordinary temperatures, while the term gas is applied to æriform bodies which are in that rarefied state at ordinary temperatures. Thus we speak of hydrogen gas, but of watery vapors. Vapors, like gases, have a certain elastic force, by which they exert a pressure on every part of any vessel in which they are enclosed. Vapors are formed instantly in a vacuum; in the atmosphere they are generated more slowly. When not saturated they exactly resemble gases in their action; when saturated and in contact with the liquid by which they were generated, they can neither be compressed nor expanded, but remain constant, both in their elastic force and in their density. Vapors of different composition vary in density. Thus if atmospheric air be taken as unity, the vapor of water=0.6235, that of alcohol 1.6138, that of sulphur 6.6542, and that of mercury 6.9760.

1. The application of vapor or steam to the body in a close place. [BATH (1), s., B. I. 2.] Medicated vapor-baths are largely employed, the aqueous vapor being impregnated with mercury, sulphur, &c., according to the nature of the disease.

2. The place or bath itself; an apparatus for heating bodies by the vapor of water.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fáll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camēl, hēr, thère; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, ūnite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

vapor-douche, vapour-douche, s. A topical vapor-bath, which consists in the direction of a jet of aqueous vapor on some part of the body.

vā'-pōr, vā'-pōur, v. i. & t. [VAPOR, s.]

A. Intransitive:

I. Literally:

1. To pass off in the form of vapor; to dissolve or disappear, as into vapor, steam, or air; to be exhaled; to evaporate.

*2. To emit or give out vapor, steam, gas, or evaporations.

"Swift running waters vapor not so much as standing waters."—Bacon: Natural History.

II. Figuratively:

*1. To pass off or disappear as a vapor.

"He now is dead, and all his furie gone.
And all his greatnes vapored to nought,
That as a glasse vpon the water shone,"

Spenser: The Ruines of Time, 219.

2. To boast, brag, or vaunt with ostentatious display; to hector, to bully.

"He vapored considerably."—London Daily Telegraph.

vā'-pōr-ā-tion, s. [Lat. vaporatio, from vaporatus, pa. par. of vaporo.] [VAPORATE.]

1. The act or process of converting into vapor.

"By conflagration and congelation, according to certain respects; by vaporation and evaporation."—Bibliotheca Biblica, i. 438.

2. The state of passing off in vapor; evaporation.

vā'-pōred, vā'-poured, adj. [Eng. vapor; -ed.] Affected with the vapors; peevish, dejected, splenetic.

vā'-pōr-ēr, vā'-pōur-ēr, s. [Eng. vapor; -er.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who vapors, brags, or hectors; one who makes a great display of his powers or worth; a braggart, a bully, a boaster. [VAPOR, s., I. 2. (2).]

"A ruffian, a riotous spendthrift, and a notable vapourer."—Camden: Hist. Elizabeth (an. 1570).

2. Entom.: The Vaporiser-moth (q. v.).

vaporiser-moth, s.

Entom.: Orgyia antiqua. The fore wings of the male are rich brown, clouded with darker tints, and having a small spot near the anal angle; the hinder wings are brown. In the females the wings are rudimentary. The male is common from July to October, and is often seen in the streets of cities. The female remains in the cocoon, on the outside of which she deposits her eggs in autumn. The larvæ, which first appear in June and continue for some months, are slaty gray, having four or five wart-like spots on each segment, with yellow and black tufts. Common in gardens, on rose-bushes and many other plants. The Scarce Vaporiser-moth, O. gonostigma, has several small white spots on the wings of the male. The larva feeds in autumn on oak, hazel, and bramble. The perfect insect appears in June.

vā'-pōr-īf-ēr-oūs, a. [Lat. vapor=vapor, and fero=to bear, to bring.] Conveying or producing vapor.

vā'-pōr-īf-ic, a. [Lat. vapor=vapor, and facio=to make.] Forming into vapor, converting into steam, or expelling in a volatile form, as fluids.

vā'-pōr-ī-zā-tion, s. [Eng. vaporiz(e); -ation.] The act or process of vaporizing; the artificial formation of vapor; the state of being vaporized.

"We cannot as yet comprehend in what manner it [heat] produces the liquefaction or vaporization of one body."—Whewell: Hist. Scientific Ideas, ii. 46.

[Vaporization, evaporation, and boiling differ slightly in meaning. Vaporization is a generic, evaporation, a specific word; the former signifying the passage of any liquor into the solid state, without reference to the slowness or rapacity with which the process is carried out, or the temperature of the liquid becoming transformed into the vapor. Evaporation generally implies the slow production of a vapor at the free surface of a liquid, and boiling always signifies the rapid production of vapor in the liquid itself.

vā'-pōr-īze, v. t. & i. [Eng. vapor; -ize.]

A. Trans.: To convert into vapor by the application of heat or artificial means; to sublimate; to cause to evaporate.

B. Intrans.: To pass off in vapor; to evaporate.

*2. In a state of dissension, discord, or controversy; at enmity.

"The Britains . . . were at variance amongst themselves."—Holinshed: Hist. Eng., bk. iv., ch. xxi.

vär'-i-ant, *var-i-aunt, a. & s. [Fr. variant, pr. par. of varier=to vary (q. v.).]

A. As adjective:

1. Different, diverse; having a different form or character.

"Men were found of nature variaunt."—Chaucer: Court of Love.

2. Variable, varying.

B. As subst.: Something different in form from but essentially the same as another; a different form, reading, version, or the like.

"There are the usual number of variants . . . from the folklore of all European countries."—Harper's Magazine, Sept., 1885, p. 642.

vär'-i-äte, v. t. & i. [Lat. variatus, pa. par. of vario=to vary (q. v.).]

A. Trans.: To make different; to vary, to diversify, to alter.

B. Intrans.: To alter, to vary, to change.

"This artificial change is but a fixation of nature's inconstancy, helping its variating infirmities."—Jeremy Taylor: Artificial Handsomeness, p. 43.

vär'-i-ät-éd, pa. par. & a. [VARIATE.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

*1. Ord. Lang.: Varied, diversified.

"Smooth, variated, unangular bodies."—Burke: Sublime and Beautiful.

2. Her.: Varriated (q. v.).

vär'-i-ä-tion, *var-i-a-ci-on, *var-i-a-cy-on, s. [Fr. variation, from Lat. variationem, accus. of variatio, from variatus pa. par. of vario=to vary (q. v.); Ital. variazione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act, process, or state of varying; partial change in the form, position, state, or qualities of a thing; alteration, change, mutation, modification.

"Absolute necessity, in which there can be no variation in any kind or degree."—Clarke: On the Attributes, prop. vii.

2. The extent to which a thing varies; the degree, interval, or amount of departure from a previous condition, position, or form; amount or rate of change.

"Another thing that stumbled me here was the variation, which, at this time, by the last amplitude I had, I found to be but 7 deg. 53 min."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1699).

*3. Difference.

"There is great variation between him that is raised to the sovereignty by the favor of his peers and him that comes to it by the suffrage of the people."—Ben Jonson: Discoveries.

4. The act of deviating; deviation.

"He observed the variation of our English from the original, and made an entire translation of the whole for his private use."—Fell.

*5. Variance, dissension, discord, disagreement.

"Thus the christen realmes were in variacyon, and the churches in great dyfference."—Berners: Froissart's Chronicle, ch. cccxlii.

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: Any deviation from the mean orbit or mean motion of a heavenly body produced by the perturbation of another body or bodies. Thus the planets are considered to move mathematically in elliptic orbits, which would be the case if they were subject to the attraction of the sun only, but being acted on by each other, there is supposed to be a minute and slow but constant variation in the elements of the ellipse. Variations which are compensated in short intervals are called periodic, and those which require for their compensation a long period are called secular. (Herschel, Astron., § 653-655.)

2. Biology:

(1) A tendency in all organisms to vary slightly from other organisms produced by the same parents.

"No two animals or plants, even when born of the same parents, are exactly alike; this is known as variation."—Ray Lankester: Degeneration, p. 13.

(2) Hereditary modification.

"We shall see how great is the power of man in accumulating, by his selection, successive slight variations."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 2d), p. 3.

(3) A modification directly due to the physical conditions of life; such as the dwarfed condition of shells in the Baltic, or of stunted plants on Alpine summits. (Darwin: Origin of Species, ch. ii.)

† (4) An organism, or a group of organisms, exhibiting modification due to external conditions.

"The term variation has been employed by some authors to designate forms less permanent than varieties, but the term has not obtained general acceptance."—Chambers' Encyclopædia (ed. 1867), ix. 716.

*3. Gram.: Change of termination of words, as in declension, conjugation, comparison, and the like; inflection.

"The rules of grammar, and useful examples of the variation of words, and the peculiar form of speech, are often appointed to be repeated."—Watts: On the Mind.

4. Music: An air or theme with variations is a musical composition in which a simple melody is first given out, and then several times repeated, each repetition containing changes by means of broken harmony, counterpoint, broken rhythm, the arpeggio, scale-passages, and even by modification of key. The earliest forms of a variation were the "divisions" added to a ground-bass; then there followed the changes above described, but the character of variations in modern music has gradually developed into a series of sound-pictures, of which the theme is indeed the main subject, but is represented under various phases of sentiment, expression, thought, and æsthetic coloring.

5. Physics & Navig.: The angle included between the true and magnetic meridians of any particular place. If the direction of the true meridian at any given place were known, the variation of the needle would be found by simply taking the bearing of this line with the compass. If the bearing of the meridian is east of north, the variation is to the west; if the bearing is west of north, the variation is to the east. In order, therefore, to find the variation of the needle at any place, we first find the direction of the true meridian, or of some line which makes a known angle with it; we then observe the bearing of this line; from this result the variation is easily computed. The line most usually employed is the line of greatest elongation of the pole star, either to the east or west. At London, in 1550, the deviation was 11° 17' E.; about 1669 it was 0°. It then began to deviate to the west, till it attained its maximum in 1815, 24° 17' 18".

¶ (1) Annual variation:

Astron.: The annual change in the right ascension or declination of a star produced by the combined influence of its own motion and the procession of the equinoxes.

(2) Calculus of variations: [CALCULUS.]

(3) Variation of elements:

Astron., Physics, & Math.: Changes in the elements entering into the calculation of any figure, rate of motion, &c. [VARIATION, II. 1., & ¶ (6).]

(4) Variation of the compass: [MAGNETISM, ¶; VARIATION, II. 5.]

(5) Variation of the moon:

Astron.: Irregularity in the moon's motion and in the form of her orbit, depending on the angular distance of the luminary from the sun. When nearest the earth the true longitude, as seen from the earth, is gaining on the mean longitude; it will be the reverse when she is in quadratures (farthest from the earth), and at intermediate points nearly coinciding with octants, she will be neither gaining nor losing. But at these points the amount of gain or loss will have reached its maximum. The entire variation produced by this cause in the moon's longitude is 1° 4'. (Herschel: Astron., § 705.)

(6) Variations of the barometer: [BAROMETER.]

variation-compass, s. A declination compass (q. v.).

vär'-i-çěl'-lā, s. [Dimin., from Mod. Lat. variola (q. v.).]

Pathol.: The name formerly given to a modified form of smallpox [VARICELLOID SMALLPOX], now confined to chicken-pox.

vär'-i-cěl'-lōid, a. [Mod. Lat. varicell(a); Eng. suff. -oid.] Resembling varicella (q. v.).

varicelloid smallpox, s.

Pathol.: Modified smallpox, in which the eruption seems to stop at its vesicular stage, most of the vesicles drying up instead of developing into pustules. Called also Abortive Smallpox.

vā-rīç'-i-form, a. [Lat. varix (genit. varicis), and forma=form.] Resembling a varix (q. v.).

vär'-i-cō-çēle, s. [Mod. Lat. varix (genit. varicis), and Gr. kelē=a tumor.]

Pathol.: A varicose condition of the veins of the spermatic cord, due to increased pressure within the vessels, or to diminished resistance in their walls and in the surrounding structures.

vär'-i-cōse, *vär'-i-coūs, a. [Latin varicosus, from varix (genit. varicis).] [VARIX.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Exhibiting or marked by a varix; preternaturally enlarged or permanently dilated. (Said of veins.)

"There are instances of one vein only being varicous, which may be destroyed by tying it above and below the dilatation."—Sharp.

2. Designed for the cure or relief of varicose veins; as, varicose stockings, elastic hose to compress and support distended veins in the leg and foot.

II. Bot.: Swollen here and there.

varicose-aneurism, s.

Pathol.: A form of aneurism in which a communication has been formed between the aorta and either of the venæ cavæ, one of the auricles, the right ventricle, or the pulmonary artery.

varicose-veins, s. pl. [VARIX.]

vär'-i-cōs'-i-tý, s. [Eng. varicos(e); -ity.] The quality or state of being varicose. (Said of a vein.)

*vär'-i-coūs, a. [VARICOSE.]

vär'-ied, pa. par. & a. [VARY.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Partially changed; altered, changed.

2. Characterized by variety; consisting of various sorts or kinds; diversified.

3. Differing from each other; diverse, various.

vär'-ied-lý, adv. [English varied; -ly.] In a varied manner; diversely.

vär'-i-ē-gäte, v. t. [Lat. variegatus, pa. par. of variego=to make of various colors, from varius=of diverse colors, various.] To diversify by means of various tints or hues; to mark with different colors in irregular patches; to spot, to streak, to dapple, or the like.

"The skill in making tulips feathered and variegated, with stripes of divers colors."—Fuller: Worthies; Norfolk.

vär'-i-ē-gät-éd, pa. par. or a. [VARIEGATE.]

Bot.: Having the color disposed in various irregular, sinuous spaces.

variegated copper-ore, s.

Min.: The same as BORNITE (q. v.).

variegated-leaves, s. pl.

Bot.: Leaves, particular parts of which are white, or of some other color than the normal green. The change in color arises from disease. [VARIEGATION, II., 2.] In exogens the pale blotches are generally irregular, in endogens they tend to follow the course of the venation. In general, the disease almost simultaneously affects all the leaves of a branch. If in this case a cutting from the diseased fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camēl, hēr, thêre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre. wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

branch be planted, the plants which result will have all the leaves with white blotches. On the other hand, if a plant in which the disease has arisen while it grew in poor soil be transferred to richer mold, the variegation will often disappear.

variegated-monkey, s.

Zoöl.: Semnopithecus nemæus, the most brightly-colored species of the genus. Head and back gray; thighs, fingers, and toes black; legs and ankles bright red; fore arms, throat, and tail pure white; throat with a more or less complete circle of bright red. They are natives of Cochín China, and appear to be good-tempered, but little is known of them. Called also the Douc.

*variegated-sandstone, s.

Geol.: A name formerly given to the New Red Sandstone called by the French grès bigarré and by the Germans Bunter Sandstein, terms all implying its parti-colored character. The system containing it was formerly called also Poikilitic (q. v.).

variegated-sole, s.

Ichthy.: Solea variegata, a small species, about eight or nine inches long, with very small pectorals; color brownish-gray, with dark bands extending between the dorsal and anal fins. It is common off the south coast of Devonshire. Called also the Banded Sole.

variegated spider-monkey, s.

Zoöl.: Ateles variegatus, or bartlettii (Gray), discovered in 1866, in Eastern Peru, by Mr. E. Bartlett. Fur abundant, long, and soft. Black, cheeks white, band across the forehead bright reddish-yellow; chest, belly, inner side and front and back part of the limbs, and side and under surface of tail, yellow. (Proc. Zoöl. Soc., 1867, p. 992.)

vär-i-ě-gā'-tion, s. [VARIEGATE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of variegating or the state of being variegated by different colors; diversity of colors or tints.

"They will soon lose their variegations"—Evetyr. Kalendarium; October.

*2. A variety. (Glanvill: Sermon 10.)

II. Botany:

1. The disposal of the color in various irregular, sinuous spaces. Nearly in the same sense as I. 1. Called also Marking.

2. Spec., a disease of plants causing their leaves to become more or less white from the absence or modification of chlorophyll. It is distinguished from chlorosis in being permanent and in leaving the health of the plant unaffected. [VARIEGATED-LEAVES.]

*var-i-en, v. t. [VARY.]

tvär-i-ēr, s. [Eng. vary; -er.] One who varies; one who strays in search of variety.

"Pious varies from the church."

Tennyson: Sea Dreams, 19.

va-rī-ě-tal, adj. [Eng. variet(y); -al.] Of or pertaining to a variety, as distinguished from an individual or a species.

"Hares, according to the altitude of their range, show almost every degree of variableness between red and white. Our common hare is widely distributed, and to such an extent do varietal forms differ, that several (so-called) distinct species have been evolved out of one."—St. James's Gazette, Jan. 6, 1887.

va-rī-ě-tŷ, s. [Fr. variété, from Lat. varietatem. accus. of varietas, from varius=various (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality or state of being varied or various; intermixture of different things or of things different in form, or a succession of different things; diversity, multifariousness.

"It [the world] is a goodly place . . . full of variety and pleasantness."—Bp. Hall. Contempl.; Victory of Faith over the World.

2. Exhibition of different characteristics by one individual; many-sidedness.

"Age cannot wither her nor custom stale Her infinite variety."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 2.

*3. Difference, dissimilitude.

"There is a variety in the tempers of good men, with relation to the different impressions they receive from different objects of charity."—Atterbury.

*4. Variation, deviation; change from a former state.

"To go about to answer those reasons by suppositions of a variety in things."—Hale. Orig. of Mankind.

5. Something differing from others of the same general kind; one of many things which agree in their general features, but differ in detail; a sort, a kind.

6. A collection or number of many different things; a varied assortment; as, He deals in a variety of goods.

¶ Used also adjectively of an entertainment consisting of singing, dancing, gymnastic performances, &c., or of performers engaged in such an entertainment.

"The biggest variety company ever seen at the East end of London."—Referee, March 25, 1886.

7. Absence of monotony or uniformity; diversification, change.

"Variety's the very spice of life That gives it all its flavor."

Cowper: Task, ii. 606.

II. Biol.: A group of organisms (subordinate to a species, but not susceptible of strict definition). They breed true to characters, but are not invariably fertile with other varieties—e. g., pouters among pigeons, and some kinds of maize among plants. The line of demarcation between varieties and species is indeterminable.

"Certainly no clear line of demarcation has as yet been drawn between species and sub-species—that is, the forms which, in the opinion of some naturalists, come very near to, but do not quite arrive at, the rank of species; or, again, between sub-species and well-marked varieties, or between lesser varieties and individual differences. These differences blend into each other by an insensible series; and a series impresses the mind with the idea of an actual passage."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 2d), p. 41.

¶ The term is often used more loosely of minerals, rocks, &c.; as, varieties of amphibole, varieties of granite, &c.

¶ For the difference between variety and difference, see DIFFERENCE.

vär-i-form, adj. [Latin varius=various, and forma=form.] Having various or different forms or shapes; varying in form.

vär-i-formed, a. [Eng. variform; -ed.] Formed with different shapes.

vär-i-fŷ, var-i-fie, v. t. [Latin varius=various, and facio=to make.]

1. To make different; to vary.

"Their workes to varifie."

Davies: Summa Totalis, p. 17.

2. To variegate; to color variously; to diversify.

"Lively colors lovely varifide."

Sylvester: The Magnificence, 661.

va-rīg-ēr-a, subst. [Modern Latin varix (genit. varicis), and Lat. gero=to carry.]

Palæont.: A genus of Tornatellidæ (q. v.), with eight species, ranging from the Neocomian to the Chalk of France.

va-rīn'-ghī-an, s. [VARANGIAN.]

va-rī-ō-la, s. [Fr. variole, from Latin varius=various, spotted.]

1. Pathol.: Smallpox (q. v.).

2. Botany: One of the pustular shields formed in Variolaria, &c. (In this sense there is a plural, va-rī-ō-læ.)

va-rī-ō-lar, a. [Mod. Lat. variola(a); Eng. adj. suff. -ar.] Pertaining to variola or smallpox; variolous.

va-rī-ō-lār-i-a, subst.* [Mod. Lat. variola, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -aria.]

Bot.: A spurious genus of Fungals, being a state of a lichen with abundant soredia. Variolaria lactea is used in dyeing.

va-rī-ō-lār-in, s. [Mod. Lat. variolaria(a); -in.]

Chem.: Robiquet's name for the crystalline body obtained by him from the alcoholic extract of Variolaria dealbata.

vär-i-öl-ic, a. [Mod. Lat. variola(a); Eng. adj. suff. -ic.] Variolous.

vär-i-ō-lite, s. [Lat. variola(a)=the smallpox; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrol.: A rock originally found in pebbles, having small, projecting pustular bodies, resulting from sub-aerial weathering. It is an aphanitic diabase, inclosing spherular concretions of a felspar, mostly labradorite. Has recently been found in situ with normal diabase.

vär-i-ō-lit-ic, a. [VARIOLA.] Thickly marked with small round specks or dots; spotted.

vär-i-ō-lōid, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. variola(a); suff. -oid.]

A. As adjective:

1. Resembling variola or smallpox.

2. Resembling measles; having the appearance of measles.

B. As substantive:

Pathol.: The name given to a disease which has the characters of variola in a mild form, but which is really small-pox modified by previous vaccination or inoculation.

va-rī-ō-loūs, adj. [Mod. Lat. variola(a); Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Pertaining to or designating small-pox; variolar.

vär-i-ör-üm, adj. [From Lat. (editio cum notis) variorum=an edition (with the notes) of various persons.] A term applied to an edition of some work in which the notes of various commentators are inserted; as, a variorum edition of a Greek classic.

vä-rī-ōūs, vär-i-ōūs, a. [Lat. varius=variegated, diverse, manifold.]

1. Differing from each other; different, diverse, manifold.

"He . . . in derision sets Upon their tongue a various spirit, to rase Quite out their native language."

Milton: P. L., xii. 53.

2. Divers, several.

"On the whole we lost little less than a month by our attendance upon her [the Gloucester], in consequence of the various mischances she encountered."—Anson: Voyages, bk. iii., ch. i.

*3. Variegated. (A Latinism.)

"The various Iris Juno sends with haste."

Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, ix. 2.

*4. Changeable, uncertain, unfixed, inconstant.

"The names of mixed modes want standards in nature, whereby to adjust their signification; therefore they are very various and doubtful."—Locke.

*5. Exhibiting different characters; multiform.

"A man so various that he seem'd to be

Not one, but all mankind's epitome."

Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. 545.

6. Having a diversity of features; not uniform or monotonous; diversified.

"Herbs of every leaf, that sudden flowered, Opening their various colors."

Milton: P. L., vii. 318.

¶ For the difference between various and different, see DIFFERENT.

vä-rī-ōūs-lŷ, vär-i-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. various; -ly.] In a various manner or degree; in various or different ways; diversely; with diversity; multifariously.

"So sweet, so shrill, so variously she sung."

Dryden: Flower and Leaf, 116.

vär-is'-çite, s. [After Variscia, the Latin name for Voigtland, where found; suff. -ite. (Min.)]

Min.: A reniform mineral of apple-green color. Composition: A hydrated phosphate of alumina. Is probably related to Calaita (q. v.).

var-isse, s. [Cf. varix.]

Farr.: An imperfection on the inside of the leg of a horse, differing from a curb, at the same height, and frequently injuring the sale of the animal by growing to an unsightly magnitude. (Craig.)

vär-ix, s. [Lat.]

1. Pathol.: The dilatation and thickening of the veins with lengthening and tortuosity, and projection of certain points in the form of knots or knobs, in which the blood coagulates, fibrin is deposited, and in the center sometimes even osseous matter; in addition the coats of the veins are diseased. Occasionally partitions are formed, and perforations communicating with the surrounding cellular tissue, which is generally more or less diseased; this form is chiefly found round the anus, causing piles or hæmorrhoids. The veins chiefly affected are the saphenous, spermatic, and hæmorrhoidal, most of all the first, producing varicose veins and ulcers of the legs in women, and clerks who sit cross-legged at their desks.

2. Zoöl.: One of the ridges or spinose lines which mark the former position of the mouth in certain univalve shells. (See illustration under UNIVALVE.)

var-lēt, var-lette, s. [O. Fr. varlet, vaslet, valet, valet. The original form was vaslet, for vasalet, dimin. from vassal=a vassal (q. v.). Varlet and valet are doublets.]

*1. A page, or knight's follower; an attendant on a gentleman; a serving-man, a groom or footman.

"For the archers who were to the nombre of iii. M. shotte faste theyr arrows, nat sparyng maisters nor varlettis."—Berners: Froissart's Cronycle, vol. i., ch. xvi.

†2. A term of contempt for a low fellow; a scoundrel, a rascal.

"There's money for thee: thou art a precious varlet."

Be fat, be fat, and blow thy master backward."

Beaum. & Flet.: Women Pleas'd, ii. 4.

*3. The court card now called the knave.

var-lēt-ěss, s.* [Eng. varlet; -ess.] A female varlet; a waiting-woman.

"Losing their noble varletess."—Richardson: Clarissa, i. 218.

var-lēt-rŷ, s. [Eng. varlet; -ry.] The rabble, the crowd, the mob.

"Gay swarms of varletry that come and go."

R. Browning: Sordello, vi.

var-mět, s. [O. Fr.]

Her.: The scallop when represented without the ears.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhūn; -tion, -şion = zhūn. -tious, -ciious, -sious = şhūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

var'-mīnt, s. [See def.] A vulgar corruption of vermin (q. v.), often applied to any person or animal, specially troublesome, mischievous, or the like; specifically in hunting slang, a fox.

"Decided the hound in question to go for the varmint he had found."—Field, Feb. 4, 1888.

var'-nīsh, ver-nisch, ver-nysche, ver-nysshe, s. [Fr. vernis=varnish, vernissier=to varnish; O. Fr. vernir (pa. par. verni)=to varnish; vernis=varnished, from a supposed Low Lat. vit-rino=to glaze, from Lat. vitrinus=pertaining to or resembling glass, from vitrum=glass; Sp. bernis, barniz=varnish, lacquer; barnizar=to varnish, to lacquer; Ital. vernice=varnish; vernicare, verniciare=to varnish; cf. Late Gr. beronikē, bernikē=amber.]

1. Lit.: A thin, resinous fluid, which, when spread over the surface of wood, metal, glass, or other solid substance, forms a shining coating, impervious to air and moisture. Varnishes are prepared by dissolving certain resins, as copal, anime, mastic, lac, &c., in spirit of wine, or in fixed or volatile oils, thus producing spirit varnishes or oil varnishes. Amber is hard, tough, and soluble with difficulty; it makes an excellent varnish, but is expensive and dries slowly. Copal is next in durability to amber, and is more largely used than any other gum in preparing oil varnishes. Anime dries quickly, but is deficient in toughness, and is liable to crack. Crystal varnish for maps or drawings is prepared by dissolving Canada balsam in the purest oil of turpentine. Common resin, dissolved by means of heat in linseed-oil or turpentine, is used as a varnish for some common purposes, and is mixed with other varnishes to impart brilliancy, but unless sparingly used renders them liable to crack. [See DAMMARIN, LAC-VARNISH, MASTIC.]

2. Figuratively:

(1) A glossy or lustrous appearance, natural or artificial, resembling varnish; as, the varnish of the holly.

(2) An artificial covering to give a fair outward appearance to any act or conduct; outside show; gloss, palliation.

"We'll put on those shall praise your excellence,
And set a double varnish on the fame
The Frenchman gave you."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 7.

¶ For the difference between varnish and gloss, see GLOSS.

varnish-tree, s.

Bot.: The name given to various trees which furnish varnish. They are chiefly natives of the hotter parts of the Eastern hemisphere, and the Varnish-tree of each country or large province is, as a rule, different from that of others. In Tenasserim, Pegu, &c., the varnish-tree is Melanorrhœa usitata, sometimes specifically called the Black, or Martabam varnish; that of Japan is Rhus vernicifera and Stagmaria verniciflua; that of Sylhet, Semecarpus anacardium. The varnish-tree of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean is Rhus coriaria. It is a tree the leaves of which are divided into five to seven pairs of hairy leaflets with a terminal one. It is fifteen to twenty feet high.

var'-nīsh, ver-nish, ver-nysshe, v. t. [VAR-NISH, s.]

1. Lit.: To cover with varnish; to lay or spread varnish on; to cover with a liquid for the purpose of giving anything a glossy surface, and also of protecting it from external influences.

"Such painted puppets! such a varnish'd race Of hollow gewgaws, only dress and face!"

Pope: Donne Imitated, sat. 4.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To cover with anything that gives a fair outward appearance to; to give an improved appearance to.

"Young people are used to varnish over their non-performance and forbearance of good actions by a pretence unto humility."—Feltham: Resolves.

(2) To give a fair superficial appearance by rhetoric; to color, to gloss over, to palliate.

"With seeming good so varnishing their ill
That it went current by the fair event,"

Drayton: Barons Wars, 67.

var'-nīsh-ēr, s. [Eng. varnish, v.; -er.]

1. Lit.: One who varnishes; one whose occupation is to varnish.

"An oil obtained of common oil may probably be of good use to surgeons and varnishers."—Boyle.

2. Fig.: One who disguises, glosses, or palliates.

"Modest dullness lurks in thought's disguise; Thou varnisher of fools." Pope: On Silence, 21.

var'-nīsh-īng, pr. par. or a. [VARNISH, v.]

varnishing-day, s. A day which precedes the opening to the public of an exhibition of paintings, when the painters of the pictures are invited to see their works, and to put such finishing touches upon them as may seem necessary, or to varnish them if they think fit. The latter is an operation not often performed upon new pictures for fear that it may cause them to crack as they dry. Called also Touching-day.

vār'-rī-āt-ēd, a. [Eng. vair; -iated.]

Her.: Cut in the form of vair; as, a bend varriated on the outsides.

vār'-rīeș, vār'-rȳș, vār'-reȳș, s. pl. [A dimin. from vair (q. v.).]

Her.: Separate pieces of vair, in form resembling a shield.

var'-sāl, a. [See def.] A vulgar corruption of universal, frequently used simply to intensify or emphasize. (Swift: Polite Conv., ii.)

'Var'-sī-tȳ, s. [See def.] University. (Slang.)

"The parson—possibly an old 'Varsity man.'"—London Daily Telegraph.

var-sō'-vī-ēne, s. [Fr.]

Music: A celebrated dance, named from Warsaw, in Poland, where it probably originated. It is characterized by strong accent on the first beat of the second and fourth bars.

var'-ta-bād, var'-ta-bēd, var'-ta-bēt, subst. [Armenian vartabad=a doctor, in the sense of a learned man.]

Ecclesiol. (pl.): An order of ecclesiastics in the Armenian church, consisting of clerics with monastic vows, in this differing from the parochial clergy who must not merely be married, but have at least one child, before they are appointed to office. They are the only men under monastic vows in the Armenian Church, no lay monks being recognized. The bishops are taken from the Vartabads. (Wilson: Lands of the Bible.)

vār'-ūs, s. [Lat.=bow-legged, straddling.] A variety of club-foot, in which the person walks on the outer edge of his foot.

var'-vēl, vēr'-vēl, s. [Fr. vervelle (O. Fr. vertelle), from Low Lat. vertibella, vertebolum, from Lat. verto=to turn.]

Falconry: A ring, usually of silver, placed on the leg of a hunting-hawk, on which the owner's name is engraved.

var'-vēlled, a. [Eng. varvel; -ed.] Having varvels or rings. In heraldry, when the leather thongs, or jesses, which tie on the bells to the legs of hawks are borne floatant, with rings at the ends, the bearing is then termed jessed, belled, and varvelled.

var'-vī-çite, subst. [After Warwickshire, where found.]

Min.: A pseudomorph of pyrolusite, after manganese; some varvicite is said to have the composition of wad.

vā'-rȳ, vār'-ȳ, *var-i-en, *var-rey, v. t. & i. [Fr. varier, from Lat. vario=to diversify, to vary, from varius=various (q. v.); Sp. & Port. variar; Ital. & Sp. variare.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To change; to alter in form, appearance, substance, or position; to make different by a partial change; to modify.

"Shall we vary our device at will,
Even as new occasion appears?"

Spenser: Mother Hubbard's Tale.

*2. To make of different kinds; to make diverse or different from each other.

"God hath divided the genius of men according to the different affairs of the world; and varied their inclinations, according to the variety of actions to be performed."—Brown.

3. To diversify.

"The epithets are sweetly varied."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, iv. 2.

*4. To change; to make unlike itself.

"Once more I'll mark how love can vary wit."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, iv. 3.

5. To relieve from monotony or uniformity; to diversify.

II. Music: To embellish, as a melody or theme, with passing notes, cadenzas, arpeggios, &c.; to make or execute variations on. [VARIATION, II. 4.]

B. Intransitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To alter; to change or be altered in any way; to suffer a partial change or alteration; to be modified.

"Fortune's mood varies again."

Shakesp.: Pericles, iii. (Prol.)

2. To be unlike or different; to differ; to be diverse.

"The violet varies from the lily as far As oak from elm: one loves the soldier, one
The silken priest."

Tennyson: Princess, v. 174.

3. To become unlike one's self; to undergo change or variation, as in purpose, opinion, or the like.

"So vary'd he, and of his tortuous train, Curl'd many a wanton wreath."

Milton: P. L., ix. 516.

4. To deviate, to depart, to swerve.

"All they of his counsaile coude nat make hym to vary fro that purpose."—Berners: Froissart; Cronycle, vol. i., ch. ccxviii.

*5. To disagree; to be at variance; to differ.

"Of the firste comynge of these Saxons into Britayne, auctors in party varrey."—Fabyan: Cronycle, ch. lxxxiii.

*6. To alter or change in succession; to alternate; to succeed.

"While fear and anger, with alternate grace, Pant in her breast, and vary in her face."

Addison: Cato.

II. Math.: To be subject to continual increase or decrease. One quantity is said to vary directly as another, when, if the one is increased or diminished, the other is also increased or diminished in the same proportion. Quantities are said to vary inversely, when, if one is increased or diminished, the other is diminished or increased in the same proportion.

"The unit of velocity varies directly as the unit of length, and inversely as the unit of time."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. i., p. 3.

vā'-rȳ, *vār'-ȳ, *var-ry, *var-ye, a. & s. [VARY, v.]

A. As adj.: Varied, variegated, various.

"Rere up their eyen, and se alle the malis steyng up upon the femalis, varye (Lat. varios) and sprynklid and spottid."—Wycliffe: Genesis xxxi. 12.

B. As subst.: Change, alteration, variation.

"[They] . . . turn their halcyon beaks

With every gale and vary of their masters."

Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 2.

vary-colored, a. Colored differently in different parts; variegated; parti-colored; diversely colored.

"A walk with vary-colored shells."

Tennyson: Arabian Nights, 57.

vās'-cū-lar, a. [Modern Lat. vasculum (q. v.); Eng. adj. suff. -ar.] [VASE.]

1. Botany:

(1) Composed of tubes or vessels. (Paxton.)

(2) Consisting of tissue in a very succulent enlarged state, as in Potamogeton. (Loudon.)

(3) Containing spiral vessels or their modifications; vasculose; connected with the circulatory system.

2. Zool.: Containing blood-vessels.

vascular-bundles, s. pl.

Veg. Physiol.: The fibrous cords which form the ribs, veins, &c., of the leaves, petioles, and other appendicular organs of all plants above the rank of mosses, and which, by their confluence and more considerable development, constitute the wood of stems and trunks. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

vascular-cryptogams, s. pl.

Bot.: The Cormophytes (q. v.).

vascular-glands, s. pl.

Anat.: Gland-like bodies supposed to effect some change in the blood which passes through them. They are the spleen, the thyroid body, the pituitary body, the lymphatic glands, &c.

vascular-plants, s. pl.

Bot.: A primary division of plants established in 1813 by De Candolle. He defined it as plants furnished with cellular tissue and vessels, and whose embryo is provided with one or more cotyledons. Called also by him Cotyledonous Plants. This division comprehended the Exogens, Endogens, and the higher Cryptogams.

vascular-sedatives, s. pl.

Pharm.: Medicines which possess the power of depressing the action of the heart, or other portions of the circulatory system. Some—as digitalis, tobacco, aconite, &c.—act chiefly on the heart, and others—as acetate of lead, ipecacuanha, &c.—on the smaller vessels and capillary system.

vascular-system, s.

1. Bot.: That portion of the interior of a plant in which spiral vessels or their modifications exist. In an exogenous stem, the vascular system is confined to the space between the pith and the bark. It chiefly consists of ducts and pitted or woody tissue collected into compact, wedge-shaped, vertical plates, the edges of which rest on the pith and the bark, while the sides are in contact with the medullary rays. It comprises the medullary sheath, which consists of spiral vessels and woody tissue intermixed. In an endogenous stem, the vascular system exists in the form of fibrous bundles, consisting of woody tissue containing spiral or other vessels, the whole imbedded in the cellular system.

2. Comp. Anat.: The circulatory system. A term applied to the whole series of vessels—arteries, veins, lymphatics, and lacteals—directly or indirectly connected with the circulation of the blood. The vessels of which it is composed are of two leading types—those which carry blood, and those carrying lymph or chyle. The first constitute the sanguiferous system, and include the heart, the arteries, the capillaries, and the veins. The second or absorbent system includes the smaller and larger lymphatic and lacteal vessels, with the lymphatic and mesenteric glands. [ARTERY, BLOOD, II. 1., CIRCULATION, B., LACTEAL, VEIN, &c.]

vascular-tonics, s. pl.

Pharm.: Medicines which give tone or strength to the heart, and other parts of the circulatory system, when these are weakened by disease. [TONIC, B. 2. (4).]

väs-cu-lär'-ēs, s. pl. [Masc. and fem. pl. of Mod. Lat. vascularis=vascular.]

Bot.: A class of plants founded by Lindley in 1830. It was not quite identical with DeCandolle's Vascular plants (q. v.), for it included only Flowering Plants, with the two sub-classes, Exogens and Endogens, excluding the higher Cryptogams, which were relegated to the Cellulares or Flowerless Plants.

väs-cu-lär'-i-tŷ, s. [Eng. vascular; -ity.] The quality or state of being vascular.

väs-cu-lif'-ēr-ōus, a. [Latin vasculum (q. v.), and fero=to bear.]

Bot.: Having seed-vessels divided into cells.

väs'-cu-lōse, a. & s. [Latin vascul(um)=a little vessel; -ose.]

†A. As adjective:

Bot.: The same as VASCULAR (q. v.).

B. As substantive:

Chem.: Fremy's name for the substance constituting the principal part of the wood-vessels in plants. It is insoluble in concentrated acids, and in an ammoniacal solution of copper.

väs'-cu-lūm (pl. väs'-cu-la), s. • [Latin, dimin. from vas=a vessel, a vase.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A botanist's case for carrying specimens as he collects them.

2. Bot.: A pitcher, as in Sarracenia and Nepenthes.

vase (or as vāse), s. [Fr., from Lat. vasum, vas=a vase, a vessel.]

1. Ord. Language: A vessel of various forms and materials, applied to the purposes of domestic life, sacrificial uses, &c. They were often used merely for ornament, or were at least primarily ornamental in character and design. The antique vases found in great numbers in ancient tombs and catacombs in Etruria, Southern Italy, Greece, Sicily, &c., and used to contain the ashes of the dead, were for the most part made of baked clay, painted and glazed, though by the Egyptians, Greeks, and Ottomans other materials, such as precious stones, gold, silver, bronze, ivory, and glass, were used. One form of vase seems to have been peculiar in Etruria—viz., black or red vessels, with figures in relief upon them. A favorite kind of vase, introduced into Rome by Pompey, was called Murrhine (q. v.). Another kind was the cameo vase, made of two layers of glass, the outer of which was opaque, and was cut down so as to leave figures standing out upon the lower layer as a ground. To this class belongs the celebrated Portland Vase in the British Museum. The glass vases of Venice became famous in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and in the same and following centuries many vases of the highest artistic performance were produced in Italy, France, and Germany. The porcelain vases of China and Japan are also characterized by great elegance of form and beauty of ornamentation.

"The toilet stands unveiled, Each silver vase in mystic order laid."
Pope: Rape of the Lock, i.

II. Technically:

1. Architecture:

(1) A sculptured ornament placed on socles or pedestals representing the vessels of the ancients, as incense-pots, flower-pots, &c. Vases usually crown or finish façades or frontispieces.

(2) The same as DRUM, s., II. 2 (q. v.).

*2. Bot.: A calyx (q. v.).

Bot.: Shaped like a flower-pot—i. e., resembling an inverted, truncate cone.

väs'-ē-līne, väs'-ē-lēne, subst. [Ger. wasser=water, and Gr. elaion=Lat. oleum=oil. Named by Mr. R. A. Cheesbrough, and applied to the preparations of the Cheesbrough Manufacturing Co.]

Chem.: Petroleum jelly. A pale yellow, translucent, semi-solid substance, consisting of a mixture of the hydrocarbons $C_{16}H_{34}$ and $C_{20}H_{42}$, obtained by treating the undistilled portion of petroleum with superheated steam, and filtering while hot through animal charcoal. It is insoluble in water, very slightly soluble in alcohol, but dissolves freely in ether, chloroform, benzine, and turpentine, is miscible in all proportions with fixed and volatile oils, melts at 35° - 40° , and commences to fume at 160° . Its density in the melted state is .840-.866. Pure vaseline does not turn rancid on exposure to the air, a property which renders it a valuable substitute for lard, &c., in the preparation of ointments liable to change. It is also said to possess curative powers of its own.

väs'-i-form, s. [Lat. vas (genit. vasis)=a vessel, and forma=form.]

Biol.: Having the shape of a tube or duct.

vā'-šite, s. [WASITE.]

vā-sō-, pref. [Lat. vas=a vessel.]

Anat.: Of, belonging to, or connected with a blood or other vessel.

Anat. & Physiol.: A term applied to nerves, the stimulation of which always causes constriction. Such are the vaso-motor fibers of the cervical, sympathetic, and splanchnic nerves. (Foster.)

vaso-dentine, s.

Compar. Anat.: That modification of dentine in which the capillary tracts of the primitive vascular pulp remain uncalcified, and carry red blood into the substance of the tissue. They form the so-called vascular or medullary canals, and are usually more or less parallel in their course. Vaso-dentine occurs in large amount in the central part of the tooth of the sloth and megatherium, in smaller amount in the teeth of the elephant and the incisors of the Rodentia. (Page.)

Anat.: Causing dilatation in vessels. Used of nerves, the stimulation of which causes dilatation of vessels. (Foster.)

vaso-motor, vaso-motorial, a.

Anat.: A term applied to nerves which govern the motions of the blood-vessels. Quain says that the term is a convenient one, but does not consider that the nerves thus indicated constitute a distinct system. Used also of the operation of those nerves.

"Our explanation of vaso-motor action would be very simple."—Foster: Physiol. (ed. 4th), p. 208.

vaso-motorial, a. [VASO-MOTOR.]

väs'-säl, väs'-säll, vas-sell, s. & a. [French vassal=a vassal, a subject, a tenant (Low Latin vassallus, vassus, vasus=a servant), from Bret. gwaz=a servant, a vassal; Wel. & Corn. gwas=a youth, a servant.]

A. As substantive:

1. A feudatory; a tenant holding lands under a superior lord, and bound by his tenure to feudal services.

"The grantor [of lands] was called the proprietor or lord; being he who retained the dominion or ultimate property of the feud or fee; and the grantee who had only the use and possession, according to the terms of the grant was styled the feudatory or vassal, which was only another name for the tenant or holder of the lands; though on account of the prejudices which we have justly conceived against the doctrines that were afterward grafted on this system, we now use the word vassal opprobriously, as synonymous to slave or bondsman."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 4.

2. A subject, a dependant, a retainer.

"The prince who had lately been his pensioner and vassal."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

*3. A servant; one who attends or acts by the will of another.

"Either the soul becomes servant and vassal to sin, or at the best it is led away captive by it."—Hale: Cont.; Of Self-denial.

*4. A bondsman, a slave, a low wretch.

"That shallow vassal."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, i. 1.

B. As adj.: Scrvile, subservient.

"Thy vassal wretch to be."—Shakesp.: Sonnet 141.

*† Rear-vassal: One who holds of a lord, who is himself a vassal.

väs'-säl, väs'-säll, v. t. [VASSAL, s.]

1. To subject to vassalage; to treat as a vassal.

"How am I vassaled then? make such thy slaves,
As dare not keep their goodness past their graves."
Beaum. & Flét.: Moral Representation.

2. To command; to rise over or above; to dominate.

"Some proud hill, whose stately eminence Vassals the fruitfull vale's circumference."
Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, i. 5.

väs'-säl-age, väs'-säl-lage (age as ig), vas-sel-lage, vas-sel-age, s. [Fr. vasselage.] [VAS-SAL, s.]

"The vassalage that binds her to the earth."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

2. Political servitude; dependence, subjection, slavery.

*3. Vassals or subjects collectively.

"Like vassalage at unawares encountering
The eye of majesty."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

*4. A territory held in vassalage; a fee, a fief.

"The Countess of Foix with six territorial vassalages."—Milman: Hist. Latin Christianity, bk. ix., ch. viii.

Prowess in arms; valor, good service.

"For all forgotten is his vassallage."

Chaucer: C. T., 3,056.

väs'-säl-äte, v. t. [Eng. vassal; -ate.] To reduce to a state of vassalage or subjection.

"Clergymen shall vassalate their consciences to gratify any potent party."—Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 496.

väs'-säl-ëss, vas-sal-esse, s. [Eng. vassal; -ess.] A female vassal or dependant.

"And be the vassall of his vassalesse."

Spenser: Daphnida.

väs-säl-lä'-tion, s. [VASSALATE.] The state of being vassal or subject; vassalage.

"And this vassallation is a penalty set by the true Judge of all things, upon our attempt to design of our own heads, the forms of good and evil."—Montague: Devoute Essayes, treat. 15, § 2.

väs'-säl-rŷ, s. [Eng. vassal; -ry.] The body of vassals; vassals collectively.

vas-sayl, s. [WASSAIL.]

vast, vaste, waste, a. & s. [Fr. vaste, from Lat. vastum, accus. of vastus=vast, of great extent.] [WASTE, s.]

vāt'-ī-ca, s. [Lat. vatica (herba)=a plant, henbane.]

Bot.: A synonym for Shorea (q. v.).

Vāt'-ī-can, s. [From Lat. mons Vaticanus=the Vatican mount or hill, one of the hills of ancient Rome, on the west bank of the Tiber.]

1. The palace of the Pope, built on the Vatican hill, immediately north of the basilica of St. Peter's. Strictly speaking, it consists of the papal palace, the court and garden of Belvidere, the library, and the museum. The present palace was built by Pope Eugenius III (1145-1153), and has been enlarged and embellished by many of his successors. Immense treasures are stored in it, including the Vatican library. The Vatican has been used more or less as a place of residence by the popes since their return from Avignon in the latter part of the fourteenth century, and here the conclaves always meet for the election of new popes. Since the conversion of Rome into the capital of Italy the Vatican has been the only residence of the pope.
2. The papal government or power.

"The resumption of these relations will be signaled by the despatch of a Russian diplomatic agent to the Vatican."—London Daily Chronicle.

¶ Thunders of the Vatican: The anathemas or denunciations of the pope.

Vatican Council, s.

Church Hist.: The First Council of the Vatican, or the Nineteenth General Council, which assembled on December 8, 1869. At the opening sitting 719 prelates were present, and the numbers rose in the following year to 764. The work done consisted of two constitutions—one, "Of the Catholic Faith," treating of the primary truths of natural religion, revelation, faith, and the connection between faith and reason; the other, "Of the Church of Christ," treating of the primacy of the Roman See, and defining the Papal claims to authority over all Christians. The first constitution was unanimously accepted in a session of 667 prelates, and confirmed by the Pope (Pius IX.) on April 20, 1870. The second constitution led to a long discussion; on May 13 the scheme, with the added clauses on Papal Infallibility, was laid before the Council, and on July 18 the bull Pastor Æternus, containing the constitution and the definition of Papal Infallibility, was read; 535 prelates voted in favor of it, two voted against it, while several absented themselves from the public session. The decree was then confirmed by the Pope. On the same day Napoleon III. declared war against Prussia; on September 20 the Italian royalists took possession of Rome, and on October 20 the Pope prorogued the Council, which has never reassembled. [INFALLIBILITY.]

vaudeville, *vaudevil (as vōd'-vil), s. [Fr. vaudeville=a country ballad, from O. Fr. vau (Fr. val) de Vire=valley of Vire, a town in Normandy.]

1. A term originally applied to a country song of like kind with those written by Oliver Basselin, of the valleys of Vaux de Vire, in Normandy, in the fifteenth century. These songs, which were satirical, had for their subjects love, drinking, and passing events. They became very popular, and were spread all over France under the name Lais des Vaux de Vire. The peculiarity of their character lived after their origin was forgotten, and plays, interspersed with songs of this description, came to be called Vaudevilles, and occasionally Virelais.
2. A light gay song, frequently embodying a satire, consisting of several couplets and refrain burden, sung to a familiar air, and often introduced into theatrical pieces; a ballad, a topical song.
3. In French drama a piece whose dialogue is intermingled with light or comic songs sung to popular airs.

2. Arch.: An extended arch covering an apartment so constructed that the stones, bricks, or other material of which it is composed sustain and keep each other in their places. Vaults are of various kinds: a cylindrical vault has a semicircular arch; a covered vault has an arch which springs from all sides of its plan; a groined vault is one formed by two vaults intersecting at right angles. When a vault is of greater height than half its span, it is said to be surmounted, and when of less height surbased. A rampant vault is one which springs from planes not parallel to the horizon; the vault placed over another constitutes a double vault. A conic vault is formed of part of the surface of a cone, and a spherical vault of part of the surface of a sphere. A vault is simple when it is formed by the surface of some regular solid, and compound when compounded of more than one surface of the same solid, or of two different solids.

Mathematics:

1. The same as RADIUS-VECTOR (q. v.).

2. A directive quantity, as a straight line, a force, or a velocity. The simplest manner in which to represent such a quantity, which involves both direction and magnitude, is by means of a straight line in space. Then the vector may be regarded as a stepping from one extremity of the line to the other. Vectors are said to be equal when their direction is the same and their magnitudes equal.

vēc'-ture, subst. [Lat. vectura, from veho (fut. par. vecturus)=to carry.] The act of carrying; carriage.

"There be but three things which one nation selleth unto another; the commoditie as nature yieldeth it; the manufacture; and the venture or carriage."—Bacon: Essays; Of Seditions and Troubles.

Vē'-dā, s. [Sansk.=knowledge; specif. inspired knowledge, from vid=to know, cogn. with Latin video=to see; Gr. oida=I know; Eng. wit, wisdom, &c.]

Hindu Sacred Lit.: The oldest Hindu sacred volume, or series of volumes, divided into four portions: The Rig-veda, the Sama-veda, the Yajur-veda, and the Atharva-veda, often spoken of as separate Vedas. The oldest is the Rig-veda; then the Sama-veda and the Yajur-veda were composed, and after an interval the Atharva-veda was added. They are in meter, consisting of hymns supposed to have been divinely revealed to certain Rishis or Brahmanical sages. The hymns of the Rig-veda are arranged in ten circles according to the families of their composers. Some are named after their individual authors. The Sama, Yajur, and Atharva Vedas consist of extracts from the Rig-vedic hymns made to be used in connection with sacrificial offerings. They are therefore in the mass more modern than the Rig-veda, though individual portions of the Sama-veda have more archaic grammatical forms than those of the Rig-veda, and may be older. The Atharva, on the contrary, is so much more modern that it did not obtain its present place without controversy. To the Samhita, or collection of hymns, in each Veda was appended a Brahmana, or prose commentary or theological treatise. With these were connected certain upanishads, speculative treatises. [UPANISHAD.] Then follow sutras (strings), consisting of short sentences strung together; but these, though founded on the Vedas, are admitted by the Brahmans to have been only of human origin. The Vedas were composed while their Aryan authors were fighting their way forward from the northwestern boundary of India across the five rivers of the Punjab onward to the Ganges. [For the theology see BRAHMANISM and RIG-VEDA.]

Vēd'-ah, Vēd'-dah, s. [Native name.]

Ethnology (pl.): A tribe inhabiting the forests of the interior of Ceylon, probably either the aborigines, or outcasts from the Singhalese. They live in a primitive state, ruled by their own chiefs, and conceal their villages in the depths of the jungle, as far as possible from the beaten paths. Their language differs but little from the common Singhalese.

Vē-dān'-gā, s. [Sansk. See def.]

Hindu Sacred Lit. (pl.): What the Brahmans call "members of the Veda." They are six in number, but this name, says Max Müller (Ancient Sanscrit Literature, p. 109), "does not imply the existence of six books or treatises intimately connected with their sacred writings, but merely the admission of six subjects, the study of which was necessary either for the reading, the understanding, or the proper sacrificial employment of the Veda." The six subjects or doctrines usually comprehended under the name Vedangas are: Siksha (=pronunciation), Chhandas (=meter), Vyākaraṇa (=grammar), Nirukta (=explanation of words), Jyotisha (=astronomy), and Kalpa (=ceremonial). The first two are considered necessary for reading the Veda, the two next for understanding it, and the last two for employing at sacrifices. The writers of the Vedangas do not claim inspiration.

Vē-dān'-ta, s. [Sansk.=conclusion of the Veda.]

Hindu Philos.: A system of religion and philosophy professedly founded on the Vedas. It is divided into the Pūrva mimāṃsa and the Uttara mimāṃsa, or the former and latter mimāṃsas, which constitute two of the leading darsanas or schools of philosophy. As the first of these is chiefly practical, the Vedānta philosophy is mainly derived from the second. It was founded by Vyasa, and was modified by Sankara, its commentator. The former identified the world with God, and contended earnestly for the reality of the external universe, which he held to have been created by God; the later Vedantists maintained that the universe is but an illusion projected by God, and is itself God. The present Vedānta system is Pantheistic. It has many adherents among the more educated Hindus. (Banerjee: On the Hindu Philosophy, &c.)

Vē-dān'-tīc, a. [Eng. Vedant(a); -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Vedas; founded on or derived from the Vedas.

Vē-dānt'-ist, s. [English Vedant(a); -ist.] One versed in the doctrines of the Vedānta (q. v.).

[Fr. vedette=a sentry, a high place from which one may see afar off, from Ital. vedetta=a sentry, a watch-tower, from veletta=a sentry-box, dimin. of veglia=a watch, watching, from Lat. vigilia a watching.] [VIGIL.] A sentinel on horseback stationed on an outpost or elevated point to watch an enemy and give notice of danger.

Vē-dīc, a. [Eng. Ved(a); -ic.] Of or relating to a Veda or the Vedas.

"Sanskrit philology has no longer an excuse for ignoring the Vedic age."—Max Müller: Ancient Sanscrit Literature (1859), p. 10.

veē-nā', s. [VINA.]

veēr, *vear, *vere, *vire, v. i. & t. [Fr. virer=to veer, to turn round, to whirl round, from Low Lat. viro=to turn; virola=a ring; Latin viriola; Sp. virar, dirar=to wind, to twist, tack, or veer; Port. virar=to turn, to change; Dut. vieren=to veer.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To turn; to alter its course, as a ship by turning her head away from the wind.

2. To shift; to change its direction, as the wind.

"The wind veered, the rain ceased."—London Daily Chronicle.

¶ The wind is said to veer when it shifts with the sun, and to back when it shifts against the sun. In nautical language it is said to veer aft when it comes to blow more astern; the contrary is to haul forward.

3. To turn round, to shift, to vary; to alter one's opinion; to be otherwise minded; said of persons, opinions, feelings, and the like.

"Thou weather-cock of government; that when the wind blows for the subject, point'st to privilege; and when it changes for the sovereign, veers to prerogative."—Dryden: Amphitryon, v.

B. Transitive:

Nautical:

1. To direct into a different course; specifically, to wear, or cause to change a course by turning the stern to windward, in opposition to tacking.

2. To let out, to veer out.

"Veering about one hundred and fifty fathoms of cable, the ship was happily brought up."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. ii., ch. vi.

3. To turn, to shift, to change.

"Sailing farther, it veers its lily to the west, and regardeth that quarter wherein the land is nearer or greater."—Browne.

¶ (1) To veer and haul: To pull tight and slacken alternately.

(2) To veer away: To let out; to slacken and let run.

(3) To veer out: To suffer to run, or to let out to a greater length.

"This obliged us to let go our sheet anchor, veering out a good scope of cable, which stooped us till 10 or 11 o'clock the next day."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1687).

veēr'-a-ble, adj. [Eng. veer, -able.] Changeable, shifting. (Said of winds.)

"We find the winds south, S. by W. and S.S.W. fresh gales; veerable to S.W."—Dampier: Discourse of Winds, ch. v.

veēr'-īng, a. & s. [VEER, v.]

A. As adj.: Shifting, changing, turning; changeable.

B. As substant.: The act of shifting, turning, or changing; fickle or capricious change.

"It is a double misfortune to a nation given to change, when they have a sovereign that is prone to fall in with all the turns and veerings of the people."—Addison: Freeholder.

veēr'-īng-lý, adv. [Eng. veering; -ly.] In a veering or shifting manner; shiftingly.

veēr'-ý, s. [See def.] A name given in America to Wilson's Thrush (Turdus fuscescens).

Vē'-gā (1), s. [ARAB.]

Astronomy: A fixed star of the first magnitude, called also Alpha Lyrae. It is one of the brightest stars in the northern hemisphere. No other large stars are near it, but Vega, Arcturus, and Polaris nearly constitute a right-angled triangle. Another triangle is formed by Vega, Deneb, and Altair. Vega emits a brilliant white light. Spectroscopic analysis shows that it contains incandescent hydrogen, sodium and magnesium. It is accompanied by a small telescopic star.

vē'-gā (2), s. [Sp.] An open plain; a tract of level and fruitful country.

"Sometimes marauders penetrated into the vega, the beautiful vega, every inch of whose soil was fertilized with human blood."—Prescott. (Annandale.)

vēg'-ēt-a-bīl'-i-tý, subst. [Eng. vegetable; -ity.] The quality or state of being vegetable; vegetable nature.

"The coagulating spirits of salt, and lapidificial juyce of the sea, which entering the parts of that plant, overcomes its vegetability, and converts it into a lapideous substance."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. v.

vēg'-ēt-a-ble, a. & s. [Fr.=vegetable, fit or able to live, from Latin vegetabilis=animating, full of life, from vegeto=to enliven, to quicken, from vegetus=lively, from vegeo=to excite, to quicken, to arouse; akin to vigeo=to flourish; Sp. vegetable; Ital. vegetabile.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining, belonging, or peculiar to plants; resembling or characteristic of a plant, or what belongs to a plant; having the nature or characteristics of a plant; occupied or concerned with plants.

B. As substantive:

1. A plant (q. v.)

"The whole tribes of vegetables or plants. These may be divided into herbs, shrubs, and trees."—Locke: Nat. Philosophy, ch. ix.

2. In a more restricted sense, a plant used for culinary purposes, or for feeding cattle, sheep, or other animals. Vegetables used for such purposes, as cabbages, turnips, beans, peas, &c., are of a more soft and fleshy substance than trees or shrubs.

vegetable-acids, s. pl.

Chem.: Acids derived from vegetable matters, now included under organic acids. The most important are acetic, oxalic, tartaric, citric, &c.

vegetable-æthiops, s. A kind of charcoal prepared by incinerating a sea-weed, Fucus vesiculosus, the Common Bladder-wrack, in a covered crucible.

vegetable-albumin, s.

Chem.: A substance occurring in small quantities in all vegetable juices. It has not yet been obtained pure, but appears to possess the general properties of the albumins.

vegetable-alkalies, s. pl.

Chem.: The proximate principles of plants which possess alkaline properties, such as morphia, quinine, &c. [ALKALOIDS.]

vegetable-anatomy, s.

Bot.: The dissection of plants. It may be (1) Gross, in which the plant is first examined with the aid of a hand-lens, or (2) Minute, in which every part is subject to the compound microscope.

vegetable-brimstone, vegetable-sulphur, s. [BRIMSTONE, LYCOPODE.]

vegetable-butter, s. The butter-like concrete oil of various trees. [BUTTER, A. II. 3, BUTTER-TREE, COCOA-BUTTER, s.] vegetable-egg, s.

Bot.: Lucuma mammosum. [LUCUMA.]

vegetable fire-cracker, s.

Bot.: Brodicea coccinea.

vegetable-flannel, s. Pine-needle wool (q. v.)

vegetable-gelatine, s. [GLUTIN.]

vegetable-gems, s. pl. Bamboo opals and cocoa-nut pearls (q. v.).

vegetable-gold, s. An acid extracted from the roots of Trixis pizahuac.

vegetable-hair, s.

Bot.: Tillandsia usneoides. [TILLANDSIA.]

vegetable horse-hair, s.

Bot.: The fiber of Chamærops humilis. [CHAMÆROPS.]

vegetable-ivory, s. [TAGUA, IVORY, ¶.]

vegetable-jelly, subst. Pectin (q. v.). The popular name appears to have been given by Lindley. (Introd. to Botany, ed. 3d, p. 46.)

vegetable-kingdom, s.

Bot.: The English equivalent of the Latin term Regnum vegetabile, used by Linnæus to designate

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

and comprehend all plants of whatever affinity, from the highest to the lowest. In his Systema Naturæ he divided it into three tribes: Monocotyledones, Dicotyledones, and Acotyledones; but he made no subsequent use of this arrangement either in his Artificial or in his Natural System of classification. For Lindley's classification, see BOTANY.

Bot.: Euphorbia punicea.

vegetable-life, subst. The life of a plant as distinguished from that of an animal. Linnæus described a vegetable as an organized being possessed of life but not of feeling. Like an animal, it has the powers of nutrition or self-support, that of assimilating to itself particles of other bodies suitable for its nourishment and growth, and finally it has the power of reproduction. [PLANT, II., 1.]

vegetable-marrow, s. [MARROW (1), s., ¶ 2.]

vegetable-morphology, s. [MORPHOLOGY.]

vegetable-mold or soil, subst. Mold or soil to a certain extent formed by decaying or decayed vegetation. It might be supposed that this would tend to increase continually in thickness, especially in tropical forests, where vegetation is so luxuriant; but a large proportion of it is swept away by the heavy rains, or, decomposing on the spot, is partly resolved into gaseous elements.

vegetable-oils, s. pl. [OIL, I., 2.]

vegetable-parchment, s. [PARCHMENT-PAPER.]

vegetable-pathology, s.

Biol.: The branch of pathology or of botany which treats of the diseases of plants.

Bot.: The physiology of plants, the branch of physiology or of botany which treats of the functions which the several organs of plants perform.

vegetable-sheep, s.

Bot.: Raoulia eximia, a New Zealand plant. So called because from its growing in large, white tufts on elevated sheep-runs it is liable to be mistaken for the sheep itself. It is a composite flower—one of the Helichryseæ.

Bot., &c.: A cotton-like fiber obtained from the seed pods of a tree, Chorisia speciosa, used by the Brazilians for stuffing pillows and cushions. It is a Sterculiad, akin to the Silk Cotton-tree, 1. & 2. (q. v.).

vegetable-sulphur, subst. [VEGETABLE-BRIMSTONE.]

vegetable-tallow, subst. A fatty substance obtained from Stillingia sebifera, Vateria indica, and other plants.

vegetable-tissue, s. [TISSUE, II., 2.]

vegetable-wax, s. A ceraceous excretion obtained from different parts of various plants, as from the coating on the fruits of Myrica cerifera. [MYRICA-TALLOW.]

vēg'-ē-tā-ly, veg-et-all, a. & s. [Fr. végétal.] [VEGETABLE.]

A. As adjective:

1. Pertaining or relating to a plant or plants; having the nature or characteristics of a plant; vegetable.

"Necessary concomitants of this vegetal faculty are life and his privation, death."—Burton: Anat. of Melancholy, p. 21.

2. Of or pertaining to the class of vital phenomena, common to animals and plants, namely, digestion and nutritive assimilation, growth, absorption, secretion, excretion, circulation, respiration, and generation, as contradistinguished from sensation and volition, which are peculiar to animals.

B. As subst.: A plant, a vegetable.

"Let brutes and vegetals that cannot think So far as nature urges, drink."

Waller: The Drinking of Healths

vēg'-ē-tāl'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. vegetal; -ity.]

1. The quality or state of being vegetal or vegetable; vegetability.

2. The aggregate of those vital phenomena which constitute the life or existence of a vegetable. [VEGETAL, A. 2.]

vēg'-ē-tār'-ī-ān, s. & a. [English veget(able); -arian.]

A. As substantive:

1. One who abstains from animal food, living exclusively on vegetables, milk, eggs, and the like. The more strict vegetarians eat vegetables and farinaceous food only, abstaining from eggs, butter, and milk.

2. One who maintains the doctrine of vegetarianism.

B. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to vegetarians or vegetarianism; of or belonging to the diet or system of vegetarians.

Vegetarian Society, s. A society consisting of members, associates, and subscribers, formed at Manchester, England, in 1847, since extended to other countries, to promote the use of cereals, pulse, and fruit as articles of diet; and to induce habits of abstinence from fish, flesh, and fowl as food. Members are pledged to adopt the vegetarian diet, associates simply agreeing to promote the objects of the society.

vēg'-ē-tār'-ī-ān-izm, s. [Eng. vegetarian; -ism.] The practice of living solely on the products of the vegetable kingdom—grain, pulse, fruit, and nuts, with or without the addition of eggs and milk and its products (butter and cheese), to the exclusion of flesh, fish, and fowl. Vegetarians allege in support of this system that man when created was exclusively frugivorous, and that his structure is not adapted for a flesh diet; that the adoption of the vegetarian method of living would enable the country to support a greater population, and render it independent of a foreign food supply; that vegetarianism promotes temperance, a peaceful disposition, and purity in thought and life; that it is preferred by children; that it is infinitely cheaper than flesh diet; that its adoption would enable the working classes not only to live better, but to save money; that it would stay the revolting horrors of the slaughter-house; that much better health is invariably enjoyed by vegetarians, who are also less liable to give way to intemperance. On the other hand, the most imminent physiologists, while admitting that a theoretically perfect diet can be obtained from the vegetable kingdom, hold that a mixed diet is the best, and the structure of man's organs (especially of the stomach and teeth) is held to prove an adaptation for all kinds of food. Apart from the story of Genesis, which many authorities hold to be poetical rather than literal, there are no means of ascertaining the diet of the first man, but practically all the remains that have been discovered show that at a very early stage in his existence man was a hunter, and lived almost exclusively on a flesh diet.

Vēg'-ē-tār'-ī-ānš, s. pl. [See def.] A Chinese sect who advocate and practice vegetarianism as a religious obligation.

vēg'-ē-tāte, v. i. [Latin vegetatus, pa. par. of vegeto=to enliven, to quicken.] [VEGETABLE.]

1. Literally:

(1) To grow up in the manner of a plant or vegetable; to grow by vegetable growth.

"The seed, being sown, was left to vegetate."—Paley: Evidences, vol. i., pt. iii., ch. viii.

(2) To promote growth, as of a plant.

2. Fig.: To live an idle, unthinking life; to have a mere existence.

vēg'-ē-tā-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. vegetationem, accus. of vegetatio, from vegetatus, past par. of vegeto=to quicken, to enliven; Spanish vegetacion; Ital. vegetazione.] [VEGETATE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act or process of vegetating; the process of growing by vegetable growth.

2. Vegetables or plants generally and collectively. (Thomson: Summer, 439.)

¶ Lyell considered that the effect of vegetation was conservative, i. e., that it retarded the destruction of the soil and the subjacent rocks by the action of running water. Thus, when the woods clothing the steep declivities of the hills bounding the upper part of the valley of the Arno were cut down in the eighteenth century, the quantity of sand washed down into the river increased enormously. (Princip. of Geol., ch. xlv.)

II. Pathol.: The term usually applied to growths and deposits connected with the valves of the heart; used also of excessive granulations on wounds, and of warty growths.

¶ Vegetation of salts:

Chem.: A name formerly applied to the crystallization of salts.

vēg'-ē-tā-tive, veg-e-ta-tive, a. & s. [Fr. végétatif=vegetative, lively.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Growing; having the power of growing, as plants.

"Substantial forms, vegetative souls, abhorrence of a vacuum."—Locke: Human Understand., bk. iii., ch. x.

2. Having the power to produce or support growth in plants.

"This growth is a constant and habitual exercise of vital or vegetative souls."—Blackie: Self-Culture, p. 41.

II. Zool.: Repeated an indefinite number of times as the limbs of a Millipede or the segments of a worm.

"The vermiform type of the articulated sub-Kingdom in which the vegetative principle of development by the frequent repetition of similar parts is still conspicuously manifested."—Owen: Anat. Invert. (ed. 1843), pp. 129, 131.

B. As subst.: A vegetable.

Biol.: The same as VEGETABLE-TISSUE (q. v.).

vēg'-ē-tā-tive-lŷ, adv. [Eng. vegetative; -ly.] In a vegetative manner. [VEGETATIVE, II.]

vēg'-ē-tā-tive-ness, s. [Eng. vegetative; -ness.] The quality or state of being vegetative, or of producing growth.

vē-gēte', adj. [Lat. vegetus=lively, vigorous.] [VEGETABLE.] Active, vigorous.

"That he had lived a healthful and vegete age till his last sickness."—Bp. Taylor: Holy Dying, ch. iv., § 1.

vēg'-ē-tive, a. & s. [Eng. veget(e); -ive.]

A. As adjective:

1. Vegetable; having the nature of a plant; capable of growth.

"The tree still panted in the unfinished part;
Not wholly vegetive, and heaved her heart."
Dryden: Ovid; Metamorphoses i.

2. Growing vigorously; vigorous, strong.

"It quickens all kind of seeds, it makes them vegetive."
—Hakewell: Apologie, bk. ii., ch. iv., § 1.

B. As subst.: A vegetable, a plant.

"Better than those vegetives, Whose souls die with them."

Massinger: Old Law, i. 1.

vēg'-ē-tō, pref. [VEGETOUS.] Of a vegetable nature.

vegeto-alkalies, s. pl. [VEGETABLE-ALKALIES.]

vegeto-animal, a. A term applied to an organism supposed to partake of the nature of an animal and of a vegetable.

"In 1747, the Italian chemist, Fabroni, made the capital discovery that the yeast ferment, the presence of which is necessary to fermentation, is what he termed a 'vegeto-animal' substance."—Huxley: Critiques, p. 76.

vēg'-ē-toūs, adj. [Latin vegetus.] [VEGETE.] Vigorous, lively, active.

"If she be fair, young, and vegetous, no sweetmeats ever drew more flies."—Ben Jonson: Silent Woman, ii. 1.

vē'-hē-mēnce, s. [Fr. véhémence, from Latin vehementia, from vehemens=vehement (q. v.); Sp. & Port. vehemencia.]

1. The quality or state of being vehement; violent ardor, fervor, or impetuosity; violence.

"To declare the vehemence of his mynde in the matter of fayth."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 665.

2. Force or impetuosity accompanying energetic action of any kind; impetuous force; impetuosity, violence, fury.

"A universal hubbub wild . . .
Borne through the hollow dark, assaults his ear
With loudest vehemence." Milton: P. L., ii. 954.

vē'-hē-mēn-čŷ, ve-he-men-cie, subst. [Lat. vehementia.] Vehemence, violence.

"The river arose so high, and ran with such vehemencie."—Holinshed: Descript. Britain, ch. xv.

vē'-hē-mēnt, a. [Fr., from Latin vehementem, accus. of vehemens=passionate, eager, vehement; lit.=carried out of one's mind, from veho=to carry, and mens=mind; Sp. & Port. vehemente; Ital. veemente.]

1. Proceeding from or characterized by strength, violence, or impetuosity of feeling or emotion; very ardent, eager, or urgent; fervent, passionate, fiery.

"The preparations went on rapidly, yet too slowly for the vehement spirit of William."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

2. Acting with great force, energy, or violence; energetic, violent, furious; as, a vehement gale.

vē'-hē-mēnt-lŷ, adv. [Eng. vehement; -ly.] In a vehement manner; with vehemence, great force, violence, or energy; violently, urgently forcibly, furiously, passionately.

"They would again retire to the place from whence they came, and would bark vehemently a long time."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1676).

vē'-hī-cle, s. [Latin vehiculum, from veho=to carry; Fr. véhicule; Sp. vehiculo; Ital. veicolo.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Any kind of carriage moving on land, whether on wheels or runners; a coach, a car, a carriage, a cart, a sledge, sleigh, or the like.

2. Fig.: That which serves as the instrument or means of conveyance, transmission, or communication.

"Painting, with all its technicalities, difficulties, and peculiar ends, is nothing but a noble and expressive language, invaluable as the vehicle of thought, but by itself nothing."—Ruskin: True and Beautiful. (Introd.)

II. Technically:

1. Art: The menstruum or medium with which the various pigments are applied in painting. Of these water is used in fresco and in water-color painting, the colors being consolidated with gum-arabic;

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, thîs; sin, aš; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shŭn; -tîon, -şion = zhŭn. -tious, -cious. -sious = shŭs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

size is used in distemper painting. In oil-painting the fixed oils of linseed, nut, and poppy are used; in encaustic painting, wax is the vehicle.

2. Pharm.: A substance in which medicine is taken. [EXCIPIENT, B. 2.]

vě-hīcled, a. [Eng. vehicl(e); -ed.] Conveyed in a vehicle; applied or imparted by means of a vehicle. [VEHICLE, I. 2.]

"Guard us through polemic life,
From poison vehicled in praise."

Green: The Grotto.

vě-hīc-u-lar, a. [Lat. vehicularis, from vehiculum = a vehicle (q. v.).] Of, pertaining to, or relating to a vehicle or vehicles.

"Vehicular traffic was impeded and blocked in the streets."—London Daily Telegraph.

vě-hīc-u-lar-ŷ, adj. [English vehicular; -y.] Vehicular.

vě-hīc-u-late, v. t. & i. [Eng. vehicle; -ate.]

A. Trans.: To convey, apply, or impart by means of a vehicle.

"Try various other means of vehiculating and conveying safe."—Carlyle: Past and Present, bk. ii., ch. i.

B. Intrans.: To ride or drive in a vehicle.

"Vehiculating in gigs or otherwise over that piece of London Road."—Carlyle: Cromwell's Letters, &c., iii. 34.

vě-hīc-u-lā-tion, s. [VEHICULATE.] Movement of vehicles; traffic.

"The new Road with its lively traffic and vehiculation seven or eight good yards below our level."—Carlyle: Reminiscences, i. 212.

vě-hīc-u-lā-tōr-ŷ, a. [Eng. vehiculat(e); -ory.] Designed for carrying.

"Logical swim-bladders, transcendental life-preservers, and other precautionary and vehiculatōry gear for setting out."—Carlyle: Life of Sterling, ch. viii.

věh-mē (v as f), s. [VEHMERICHTE.]

věhm-gě-rich-tē (v as f, ch guttural), s. [Pl. of Ger. vehmgericht, from O. Ger. veme, feme, fem = punishment, and gericht = a court of justice.]

Hist.: A system of secret tribunals which originated during the Middle Ages in Westphalia, and then spread over Germany, where the regular administration of justice had fallen into complete disorder. The supreme government of the Vehm tribunals was vested in the Great or General Chapter, composed of the Freegraves and all the other initiated members, high and low. The assemblies of the tribunals were generally held in broad daylight and in public, sometimes by night and in secret. The last tribunal was held at Zell in 1568, but a few Vehm tribunals existed in name, though without possessing any remnant of their pristine power, as late as the middle of the eighteenth century. Westphalia was divided into districts, each of which usually contained one, and sometimes many, Vehm tribunals, whose boundaries were accurately defined. The court itself was composed of "Echevins," nominated by the Lord or Graff, and divided into two classes—(1) the ordinary, and (2) the Wissender, or Witan—who were admitted under a strict bond of secrecy. The criminal jurisdiction of the Vehm tribunals took the very widest range. They, like the Echevins, were of two classes—(1) the open court, or Folkmoot, and (2) the far-famed and dreaded Secret Tribunal. Charlemagne, according to the tradition, was the founder of the Vehm tribunal, but this is not confirmed either by documentary evidence or by contemporary history. More probably these tribunals were the original summary jurisdictions of the old Saxons, which survived the subjugation of their country. In fact, these proceedings differed in no essential character from the summary jurisdiction exercised in the townships and hundreds of Anglo-Saxon England. (For illustrations of the proceedings of the Vehmgerichte, see Sir W. Scott's Anne of Geierstein.)

věhm-īc (v as f), a. [Eng. vehm(e); -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Vehme or Vehmgerichte (q. v.).

věil, vāil, vaile, vayle, veile, s. [O. Fr. veile; Fr. voile, from Lat. velum = a sail, a covering, from veho = to carry, to bear along.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Something hung up or spread out to intercept the view; a covering hung or suspended in front of or over something to prevent it from being seen; a screen, a curtain; specifically, a more or less transparent piece of dress worn to conceal, shade, or protect the face.

"The veil of the temple was rent in twain."—Matt. xvii. 51.

2. Fig.: Anything that prevents observation; a covering, mask, disguise, or the like.

"Under the veile of darke and obscure speeches."—Holinshead: Hist. Scotland (an. 1279).

II. Technically:

1. Anat., &c.: [VELUM.]

2. Ecclesiol.: The name given to more or less precious fabrics used for covering persons or things. The chief are the Eucharistic veils, of silk or fine linen, used to cover the altar vessels or the elements, or thrown over the shoulders of the priest at Benediction and of the deacon at High Mass [HUMERAL-VEIL]; the veil worn by nuns on making their profession; and the purple veils used to cover the crucifix, pictures, and statuary in churches in Holy week.

¶ To take the veil: To assume the veil according to the custom of a woman when she becomes a nun; to retire to a convent.

"The abbess was of noble blood,
But early took the veil and hood."

Scott: Marmion, ii. 3.

By the Phæacians weeping at the song."

Cowper: Homer's Odyssey, viii.

II. Figuratively:

1. To keep from being seen; to hide, to conceal, to disguise.

"Yonder blazing cloud that veils the hill."

Milton: P. L., xi. 229.

2. To invest, to enshroud, to conceal.

3. To mask, to disguise.

"I have veiled my look."

Shakesp.: Julius Cæsar, i. 2.

věiled, vāiled, a. [Eng. veil; -ed.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Covered, hidden, or protected by a veil.

*2. Having taken the veil; having become a nun.

"She had surely been sainted if vailed."—Fuller: Worthies; Essex.

II. Bot.: The same as VELATE (q. v.).

Music. A voice which is not clear, but sounds as if it passed through some interposed medium. (Grove.)

věil-ing, s. [Eng. veil; -ing.] A veil; a thin covering.

"Draped with a light veiling of white mist-like lisse."—London Daily Telegraph.

věil-lēss, a. [Eng. veil, s.; -less.] Destitute of a veil.

"He drove the dust against her veinless eyes."

Tennyson: Geraint and Enid.

věin, vayne, veine, veyne, subst. [Fr. veine, from Lat. vena = a vein, from the same root as veho = to carry; Sp. & Ital. vena.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 1.

2. A streak or wave of different color, appearing in wood, marble, and other stones; a long, irregular streak of color.

3. A cavity, fissure, cleft, or hollow, as in the earth or other substance.

"To do me business in the veins o' the earth."

Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

4. Any distinctive or valuable property or characteristic considered as running through, or intermingled with others; a continued strain; a current, a stream.

"He can open a vein of true and noble thinking."—Swift. (Todd.)

5. Manner of speech or action; particular style, character, disposition, or cast of mind.

"This is Ercole's vein, a tyrant's vein."—Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 2.

6. Particular mood, disposition, temper, line of thought or humor.

"To see you in this merry vein."

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, ii. 2.

*7. Favorable moment; time when any inclination is predominant.

"Artisans have not only their growths and perfections, but likewise their veins and times."—Wotton: Architecture.

II. Technically:

1. Anat. (pl.): Thin ramifying elastic tubes arising in the extremities of the body, and proceeding by a more or less direct course to the heart, to which they carry back the blood sent forth by the arteries and transferred to them by the capillaries connecting the two kinds of vessels. They fall under three great divisions: the pulmonary, the systemic veins, and those constituting the portal system. The pulmonary veins consist of four short venous trunks which carry the red blood back from the lungs to the left side of the heart, and which are found two on each side in the root of the corresponding lung. The systemic veins arise by small branches, which receive the blood from the capillaries [CAPILLARY-VESSELS] throughout the body, and uniting to form larger vessels and then two large venous trunks, the superior and inferior venæ cavæ, finally enter the right auricle of the heart, into which the coronary veins also conduct the blood which nourishes that organ itself. These systemic veins are naturally divided into two groups, according to the channel by which they enter the heart. The veins of the head, the neck, the upper limbs, the spine, the heart, and part of the walls of the thorax and abdomen, make their entrance into the right auricle by the superior vena cava, while those of the lower part of the trunk and the abdominal viscera do so by the inferior vena cava. The veins of the portal system bring back the blood from the stomach, the intestines, the spleen, and the pancreas; then joining, they form the great portal vein which ramifies in the surface of the liver, after the manner of an artery, before finally entering the heart by the inferior vena cava. The anastomoses of veins are much larger and more numerous than those of arteries. In many parts of the body there are two sets, one superior, the other more deeply seated, with frequent communications between the two. Some veins possess valves, while others are destitute of them. All the ramifications of veins are named; the most important will be found in this dictionary. The walls of the veins are thinner than those of the arteries, but the veins themselves are less elastic. The total capacity of the veins is much greater than that of the arteries; so much so that the veins alone can hold the mass of blood which in life is distributed over both arteries and veins. While there is a considerable pressure even in the smaller and a greater one in the larger arteries, the pressure in veins is greatest in those of smaller bore, and even in them is but slight; hence, while a pulse is present in the arteries, it is as a rule absent in the veins. The velocity of the blood in the veins is least in those of smaller diameter and greatest in the larger trunks, which is the reverse of the rule in arteries. When a vein is cut the flow from the distal end—i. e., from the end nearest the capillaries—is continuous, but the blood is ejected with little force.

2. Bot. (pl.): The ramifications of the petiole among the cellular tissue of a leaf, of which they constitute the framework. They are of fibro-vascular tissue, and carry sap into the parenchyma. The principal vein, that which forms the continuation of the petiole and the axis of the leaf, is called the costa or midrib, a term which Lindley proposes to extend to all main veins proceeding direct from the base to the apex of a leaf, or to the points of its lobes. The ramifications sent out by the midrib, called by some lateral ribs, he terms primary veins. They curve toward the apex, and anastomose with the back of the primary vein which lies next to them. The part of the primary vein which curves in the vicinity of this anastomosis he calls the curved vein, and those external to it the marginal veins. Veins running at right angles from the midrib and alternate with the primary veins he terms costal veins. [VEINLET, VENATION.]

3. Geol.: A crack in a rock filled up by substances different from the rock. These may be either earthy or metallic. In very many cases the fissures have been produced by volcanic or earthquake action, and they often coincide with faults. Water descending by these fissures to unknown depths has been raised to so high a temperature that it has become capable of holding in solution various metallic and other mineral substances. As the water has cooled it has gradually deposited these matters held in solution, not doing so simultaneously, but in succession. Metalliferous veins vary greatly in width, being sometimes a few inches, frequently three or four feet, and sometimes much more. The thinner portions often branch off into innumerable slender ramifications like the veins of an animal, whence their name. Sometimes part of the material filling veins has fallen in from above or been segregated from the rocks constituting the sides of the fissure. They are often parallel, are associated with dykes, and are more common in the palæozoic than in more modern strata. They vary in age, and not unfrequently one crosses another.

4. Mining:

(1) A lead or lode of ore-bearing rock, alive or dead; that is, containing ore or not.

(2) A seam of metalliferous matter filling up a former fissure in rock. [PIPE-VEIN, RAKE-VEIN.]

5. Pathol.: The chief affections to which veins are subjected are: Inflammation, varix, hypertrophy, atrophy, degeneration, phlebolites, parasites, and new growths. In surgical operations the accidental sudden entry of air often causes death by arresting the pulmonary circulation. If slowly injected an enormous quantity may be (and has been) pumped into the vein with impunity, while a quantity sufficient to fill the auricle, entering suddenly, would certainly prove fatal. The first recorded case of spontaneous entry of air in man occurred in 1707, though experiments had been made on the lower animals in the seventeenth century.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

vein-stone, vein-stuff, s.

Min.: The gangue or matrix of the ore. It frequently consists of crystallized silica, fluorspar, or carbonate of lime.

vein-stuff, s. [VEIN-STONE.]

vēin, v. t. [VEIN, subst.] To fill or furnish with veins; to cover with veins; to streak or variegate with or as with veins.

"Tho' all the gold
That veins the world were packed to make your crown."
Tennyson: Princess, iv. 522.

vēin'-age (age as īg), subst. [Eng. vein; -age.] Veining; veins.

"The rich fruit glistening with the ruddy sun-streaks or with the russet veinage mellowing."—Blackmore: Alice Lorraine, ch. xxii.

vēin'-al, a. [Eng. vein, s.; -al.] Pertaining or relating to the veins; venous.

vēined, a. [Eng. vein, s.; -ed.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Full of veins; marked with or as with veins; streaked, variegated.

"Meadows often veined with gentle-gliding brooks."—Drayton: Polyolbion. (Pref.)

2. Bot.: Traversed by veins, as the parenchyma of a leaf.

vēin'-īng, a. [Eng. vein, s.; -ing.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act or process of streaking or marking with veins.

2. A streaked or variegated appearance, as if covered with a network of veins.

3. A kind of needlework in which the veins of a piece of muslin are wrought to a pattern.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: The same as VENATION (q. v.).

2. Weaving: A stripe in the cloth formed by a vacancy in the warp.

vēin'-lēss, a. [Eng. vein, s.; -less.] Destitute of veins; as, a veinless leaf. Used in botany when there are no veins in a leaf, except a slight approach to a midrib, as in the Mosses and the Fuci. Leaves of this kind exist only in the lowest tribes of foliaceous plants, and must not be confounded with fleshy or thickened leaves in the higher orders in which the veins are not absent, but only concealed within the substance of the parenchyma.

vēin'-lēt, s. [Eng. vein, s.; -let.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A little vein; a vein branching off from a large vein.

"Joins itself with other veins and veinlets."—Carlyle: Miscellaneous, iv., 206.

2. Bot.: A vein of the smallest size. Lindley describes and names three kinds of them in the leaves of plants: (1) Marginal veinlets, constituting a fine network of minute veins connecting the external veins with the margin of the leaf. The primary veins are themselves connected by fine veins, which he calls (2) Proper veinlets, where they immediately leave the primary veins, and (3) Common veinlets, where they anastomose in the area between them. [VEIN, II. 2.]

vēin'-oūs, a. [Eng. vein, s.; -ous.] Veined; having the veins prominent or strongly marked.

"She clasped his veinous and knotted hands."—Dickens: Tale of Two Cities, bk. ii., ch. ix.

vēin'-y, a. [Eng. vein, s.; -y.] Full of veins; veined. (Thomson: Summer, 135.)

veize, v. t. [Etym. doubtful; cf. PHEESE.] (See extract.)

"Some have confidently affirmed, in my hearing, that the word to veize (that is, in the West, to drive away with a witness) had its original from his [Vesty] profligating of the lands of his bishoprick; but I yet demure to the truth hereof."—Fuller: Worthies; Warwickshire.

vē-lar, a. [Lat. velum=a cloth, a sail; Eng. adj. suff. -ar.] [VELUM, s.] Of, pertaining to, or relating to a veil; specifically, in philology, a term applied to certain sounds, as those represented by the letters gw, kw, qu, produced by the aid of the veil, or soft palate.

vē-lār'-ī-ūm, s. [Lat.]

Rom. Antiq.: The great awning stretched over the roofless Roman theaters or amphitheaters, as a protection against rain or the sun's rays. These awnings were generally of wool or linen; cotton was used for the purpose a little before the time of Julius Cæsar (Plin., H. N., xix. 1, 6.) This vast extent of canvas was supported by masts (Lucr., vi. 108) fixed in rings in the outer wall. In the Great Theater at Pompeii, these rings may still be seen; they are at regular intervals, and one above another, so that each mast was fixed in two rings. There is a similar contrivance in the Coliseum at Rome; but there the masts were on the outside of the walls, and rested on consoles, passing through holes cut in the cornice.

vē-lāte, a. [Latin velatus, pa. par. of velo=to veil.]

Bot.: Having a veil; veiled.

vēl'-a-tū'-rā, s. [Ital.]

Art.: A mode of glazing adopted by the early Italian painters, by which the color was rubbed on by all the fingers, or the flat of the hand, so as to fill the interstices left by the brush, and cover the entire surface of the picture thinly and evenly. (Fairholt.) vē-lēl'-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. velum = a sail.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Velellidæ (q. v.). The hydrosoma consists of a widely-expanded rhomboidal pneumatophore, carrying on its upper surface a diagonal, vertical crest, which is exposed to the wind like a sail. The species are about two inches in length by one inch and a half in height.

vē-lēl'-lī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. velell(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Oceanic Hydrozoa, with two genera, Velella and Porpita.

vēl'-ī-ā, s. [Etym. doubtful. Prob. from Latin Velia=(1) an elevated part of the Palatine Hill, Rome; (2) a town on the coast of Lucania.]

Entomology: A genus of Hydrometridæ (q. v.). Antennæ filiform, four-jointed, the first joint the longest, the others about equal to each other in length, and bent at an angle with the first. Rostrum two-jointed; legs moderate, nearly equidistant.

vē-līf'-ēr-oūs, a. [Lat. velum=a sail, and fero=to bear.] Bearing or carrying sails.

"They invented veliferous chariots."—Evelyn: Navigation and Commerce.

vēl'-ī-gēr, s. [VELIGEROUS.] The embryo of a mollusk in the peculiar larval stage during which it possesses a swimming membrane, two lateral wing-like ciliated expansions, known as the velum.

vē-līg'-ēr-oūs, adj. [Latin velum and gero=to bear.] Bearing a velum (q. v.).

vē-līnche', vā-līnch', s. [VALINCH.]

vēl'-tā'-tion, s. [Lat. velitatio, from velitatus, pa. par. of velitor=to skirmish, from veles (genit. velitis)=a light-armed soldier.] A dispute or contest; a slight skirmish.

"But all these were but small velitations and conflicts preparatory to the main battle."—Hale: Cont.; Of the Knowledge of Christ Crucified.

vē-liv'-ō-lant, a. [Lat. velivolans, from velum=a sail, and volans, pr. par. of volo=to fly.] Passing under sail.

vēll, s. [FELL, s.] The maw or stomach of a young calf, used for rennet. (Prov.) vēll, v. t. [VELL, subst.] To cut off the turf or sward of, as of land. (Prov.)

vēl'-lā, s. [Said to be from Celtic veler; Gaelic biolar=a cress.]

Botany: Cress-rocket; the typical genus of Vellidæ (q. v.). Calyx erect; pouch swollen, two-celled, with a dilated flat-winged style, twice as long as the valves; seeds four in each cell. Vella annua, the Annual Cress-rocket, is said to have been found on Salisbury Plain, but not since the time of Ray.

Vēl'-lē-da, s. [Lat. Veleda=a prophetic virgin among the Germans, regarded as a divine being. (Tacitus: Hist., iv. 61; Germ., viii.; cf. Statius: Silvae, I. iv. 49.)]

vēl'-lē'-ī-tŷ, s. [Fr. velléité, as if from a Latin velletatem, accus. of velleitas, from velle=to wish.] Inclination in the way of volition; an indolent or inactive wish or inclination toward a thing, but unaccompanied by any energetic effort to obtain it.

vēl'-lī-cāte, v. t. & i. [Lat. vellicatus, pa. par. of vellico; freq. from vello=to pull.]

A. Trans.: To twitch, to pluck; to cause to twitch convulsively; applied to the muscles and fibers of animals.

"Bodies which are rough and angular, rouse and vellicate the organs of feeling."—Burke: Sublime and Beautiful, § 20.

B. Intrans.: To twitch; to move spasmodically.

vēl'-lī-cā'-tion, s. [Lat. vellicatio, from vellicatus, pa. par. of vellico.] [VELLICATION.]

1. The act of twitching or of causing to twitch.

2. A twitching; a convulsive or spasmodic movement of muscular fiber.

"And therefore we see that almost all purgers have a kind of twitching and vellication, besides the griping which cometh of wind."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 37.

vēl'-lī-cā-tive, a. [English vellicat(e); -ive.] Having the property or power of vellicating, twitching, or plucking.

vēl'-lī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vell(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Orthoplocææ, having the pouch with the valves convex and the dissipments broad.

vellon (as vēl'-yōn), subst. [Sp., same word as billon.] A kind of Spanish money of account. Also used like the English sterling. The reale de vellon is equal to about 5 cents.

vēl'-lōped, a. [Etym. doubtful.]

Her.: Having gills of such or such a tincture. Applied to a cock whose gills are borne of a different tincture from the body.

vēl'-lō'-zī-ā, s. [Etym. unknown.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Velloziææ. Stem dichotomously branched; leaves linear or linear-lanceolate, generally arranged spirally; flowers large, solitary, white, blue, or violet; perianth connate; stamens six or indefinite; ovary inferior, three-celled; capsules sub-globose, with many seeds. Characteristic of the mountain-regions of Brazil.

vēl'-lō'-zī-ē'-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vellozi(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe doubtfully placed by Lindley under Hæmodoracææ.

vēl'-lūm, *vel-am, *vel-lam, *vel-im, *vel-ym, *vel-yme, s. [Fr. velin, from Low Lat. vitulinum, or pellis vitulina=prepared calf-skin, vellum, from Lat. vitulinus=belonging to a calf; vitulus=a calf. For the change of n to m, cf. venom.] [VEAL.] A fine parchment made of calf-skin. The skins are limed, shaved, washed, stretched, scraped, and rubbed down with pumice-stone. The term is also applied to a superior kind of writing-paper, and to a kind of cotton cloth prepared to imitate, more or less, vellum in appearance.

"The tree, so pruned, dressed, and cultivated, was, within a few days, transplanted into a large sheet of vellum, and placed in the great hall."—Addison: Spectator, No. 612.

vēl'-lūm-ŷ, a. [Eng. vellum; -y.] Resembling vellum.

vēl'-lūre, s. [VELURE.]

vēl'-lūs, s. [Lat.=a fleece.]

Bot.: The stipe of certain fungals.

vēl'-lūte, s. & a. [Ital. velluto.] Velvet (q. v.).

"Charges of coaches, vellute gowns."
Ben Jonson: Magellio Lady.

vē-lō'-cē (c as ch), a. [Ital. quick.]

Music: A direction prefixed to a passage or movement to indicate that it is to be performed with great quickness or swiftness.

vē-lōç'-ī-man, s. [Lat. velox (genit. velocis)=swift, and manus=the hand.] A carriage of the nature of a velocipede, but driven by hand.

vēl'-ō-çim'-ē-tēr, s. [Lat. velox (genit. velocis)=swift, and Eng. meter.] An apparatus for measuring and ascertaining the speed of machines, &c. There are numerous varieties.

"The new velocimeter invented by Colonel Sebert for registering recoils, pressure on buffers, and velocity of projectile through the gun."—London Daily Chronicle.

vē-lōç'-ī-pēde, s. [Lat. velox (genit. velocis)=swift, and pes (genit. pedis)=a foot.] A word applied to any kind of carriage driven by the feet, and formerly to bicycles and tricycles. The name was first used in France, toward the end of the last century, when riding on the dandy-horse became popular. The two wheels of the dandy-horse were of equal size, connected by a bar, on which a saddle was placed, and astride of which the rider sat. The impetus was given by the rider's feet touching the ground, alternately pushing and being raised. Self-propulsion was next attempted by pulling levers with the hands or treading with the feet. In this kind of velocipede there were three wheels; but it never became very popular, on account of the labor. In the year 1863 the bicycle was introduced into this country. This velocipede consisted of two wheels—as the name implies—of equal size. The rider sat on a saddle connected with the backbone, and propelled himself by pressing his feet on pedals at the ends of cranks which turned the wheel. It was a great improvement on the dandy-horse; but, owing to the heavy weight of the machine, faulty bearings, and the vibration—which was so great that this form of the velocipede acquired the name of "bone-shaker"—the bicycle never became really popular until the introduction of the indiarubber tire. The attention of manufacturers was now attracted toward further improvement. Mr. Stanley, of Coventry, England, invented a light wheel, consisting of a steel rim, grooved for the reception of the tire, with stretched spokes of thin steel wire. This "tension" wheel was so light and graceful, yet strong, that it at once superseded the old one, and virtually created the modern velocipede. The size of the hind wheel was reduced and the front one enlarged, and the bicycle was finally perfected by the invention of almost frictionless "ball-bearings," in which the spindles roll between free polished steel balls. The popularity and usefulness of the bicycle led manufacturers to improve the old three-wheeled velocipede by adopting the spider-wheel and ball-bearings, and the rotary pedal action. In these machines the pedals actuated a toothed wheel, which communicated the motion by a chain to another toothed wheel on the axle of the driving-wheels. By varying the proportion of these chain-wheels, a small wheel is made equal in velocity to a larger one, and this is termed the "gearing" of the machine. [TRICYCLE.] Next came the sociable (q.v.); but, on account of its weight and cumbersomeness on the road and in stabling, it was soon displaced by the tandem (q.v.). The velocipede known as a Safety Bicycle has two small wheels of the same size (or nearly so), the rider sitting well back from the front wheel, and thus possessing greater security from falling forward, and the requisite velocity is attained from the small wheels by the principle of "gearing-up," adopted from the tricycle, the various classes of machines thus appropriating improvements from each other. One of the latest forms of velocipede invented is a tandem bicycle.

vě-lōç'-ī-pēd-īst, s. [Eng. velociped(e); -ist.] One who uses or rides on a velocipede.

"Four velocipedists of the Tours Véloce-Club."—St. James's Gazette, May 15, 1888.

vě-lōç'-ī-tý, s. [Fr. velocité, from Lat. velocitatem, accus. of velocitas, from velox (genit. velocis) = swift, from the same root as vol = to fly; Sp. velocidad; Port. velocidade; Ital. velocità.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Quickness or speed in motion or movement; swiftness, rapidity, celerity, speed. (Seldom applied to the movements of animals.)

2. Physics: Rate of motion, whether fast or slow; the rate at which a body changes its position in space; the rate of change of position of a point per unit of time. Velocity is said to be accelerated when the body moving passes through a greater space in equal successive times, as in the case of bodies falling under the action of gravity; and to be retarded when a less space is passed through in each successive portion of time. (See extract.)

"When a material point moves, it describes a continuous line which may be either straight or curved, and is called its path and sometimes its trajectory. Motion which takes place along a straight line is called rectilinear motion; that which takes place along a curved line is called curvilinear motion. The rate of the motion of a point is called its velocity. Velocity may be either uniform or variable; it is uniform when the point describes equal spaces or portions of its path in all equal times; it is variable when the point describes unequal portions of its path in any equal times. Uniform velocity is measured by the number of units of space described in a given unit of time. The units commonly employed in this country are feet and seconds. Variable velocity is measured at any instant by the number of units of space a body would describe if it continued to move uniformly from that instant for a unit of time. Thus, suppose a body to run down an inclined plane, it is a matter of ordinary observation that it moves more and more quickly during its descent; suppose that at any point it has a velocity 15, this means that at that point it is moving at the rate of 15 feet per second, or, in other words, if from that point all increase of velocity ceased, it would describe 15 feet in the next second."—Ganot: Physics (ed. Atkinson), § 25.

¶ (1) Angular velocity: [ANGULAR.]

(2) Initial velocity: The rate of movement of a body at starting; used especially of the velocity of a projectile, as it issues from a firearm.

(3) Unit of velocity: That velocity with which the unit length would be described in the unit time. (Everett: C. G. S. System of Units, ch. i., pt. ii.)

(4) Virtual velocity: [VIRTUAL.]

vě-lō'-nī-a, s. [VALONIA.]

vě-lōur', s. [Fr. vellour.] A hatter's lustring and smoothing pad of silk or plush.

vě-lōurs', s. [Fr.=velvet (q.v.).] A fabric for upholstery, carpentry, &c. It is a velvet or plush, partly of linen and partly of double cotton warps with mohair yarn weft.

vě-lōu'-tê, s. [Fr.=as adj., velvety; as subst., any substance like velvet.] Velouté sauce (q.v.).

velouté-sauce, s.

Cook.: A superior white sauce made by boiling down veal, poultry and ham. When veloute is reduced to a glaze and cream added, it is known as Sauce Suprême.

vělt'-färe, s. [See def.] A fieldfare. (Prov.)

vě'-lūm, s. [Lat.=a covering, awning, curtain, veil, or cloth.]

1. Anat.: A veil, a partition; specif. velum palati, the soft palate, a compound membranous septum, which prevents the food from ascending to the upper part of the pharynx. The term velum is also used of the anterior and posterior medullary valves of the cerebrum.

2. Bot.: The horizontal membrane which connects the margin of the pileus with the stipes of a fungus. Such a veil when adnate with the surface of the pileus, is called velum universale (a universal veil), and when extending only from the margins of the pileus to the stipes, velum parziale (a partial veil).

3. Zoölogy:

(1) A single or double ciliated lobe occurring in the young of some bivalve mollusks when they leave the parent. (Nicholson.)

(2) An extension of the cephalic integument in the young of the Gasteropoda. It commences as a circlet of cilia round the head. (Nicholson.)

(3) The membrane which surrounds and partially closes the mouth of the disc of Medusæ or of Medusiform gonophores. (Nicholson.)

vě-lū'-mēn, s. [Lat.=a fleece.]

Bot.: The velvety coating produced in some leaves by short, very dense and soft, but rather rigid hairs, as in many Lasiandras.

vēl'-lūre, *vēl'-lūre, s. [Fr. velours.] Velvet (q.v.).

"His horse with one girt, six times pieced, and a woman's crupper of velure, pieced with packthread."—Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iii. 2.

vě-lū-tī'-nā, s. [Mod. Latin velutinus=velvety, from Lat. vellus=a fleece.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A genus of Naticidæ, with four recent species from Britain, Norway, and North America. Shell thin, with a velvety epidermis; spire small, suture deep, aperture very large and rounded, no operculum. Margin of mantle developed all round and turned up over the shell; gills two, head broad, tentacles blunt, far apart, with eyes at their outer bases. The animal is carnivorous. Three fossil species from the Pliocene of Britain.

vě-lū'-tīn-ōūs, a. [Ital. velluto=velvet.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Resembling velvet; velvety, soft.

2. Botany: Velvety, having the surface hairy, and with the look and feel of velvet, as in Cotyledon coccineus.

věl'-vēr-ēt, s. [A dimin. from velvet (q.v.).] An inferior kind of velvet.

"No doubt his lordship recognizes
The coat he had on at assizes;
A velveret, genteel and neat,
With tabby lined, and frogs complete."

Anstey: Pleader's Guide, lect. 7.

věl'-vēt, *vel-et, *vel-let, *vel-ouet, *vel-ouette, *vel-wet, *vel-lure, s. & a. [O. Italian veluto (Ital. velluto), from a supposed Low Latin villutus=shaggy (Lat. villosus), from Lat. villus=shaggy hair, a tuft of hair. The form vellure is directly from French velours=velvet, from Lat. villosus.]

A. As substantive:

I. Literally:

1. Fabric: A silk fabric in which the warp is passed over wires so as to make a row of loops which project from the backing, and are thus left by withdrawing the wire for an uncut or pile velvet; but are cut by a knife to make a cut velvet. [VELVETEEN.]

"Another piece of cloth of golde raised with crimosin velvet in graine, a piece of purple velvet."—Hackluyt: Voyages, i. 287.

¶ The manufacture is not known to have taken place earlier than the thirteenth century. It is mentioned by Joinville in 1272. For a time it was confined to Italy, then it extended to France, and finally was brought to England by the refugees who came over, in 1685, on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

2. A delicate hairy integument covering the antlers of a deer in the first stages of growth. It is provided with blood-vessels, which supply nutriment to the horn, but gradually begins to shrivel and peel off, its complete disappearance being hastened by the deer rubbing its antlers against trees, &c.

"They cannot have much of a time with the red deer (Bara singh), whose horns are likely to be in velvet till the last weeks of that month."—Field, Feb. 13, 1886.

II. Fig.: That portion of the proceeds of a transaction which represents clear gain, and that usually acquired without effort. (Slang.)

B. As adjective:

1. Made or consisting of velvet.

"Will any man thinke that a velvet cote is of more price than a linnen coife?"—Hooker: Eccles. Pol., bk. v., § 6.

2. With a surface like velvet; velvety.

"The cowslip's velvet head."—Milton: Comus, 898.

vě-nā'-tion (2), s. [Lat. vena=a vein.]

Bot.: The arrangement of the veins in the leaves of plants. If a leaf has only a single midrib without branches, as in many Coniferæ, the venation is said to be simple. The three leading types of venation are the Reticulated, Netted, or Angular, found in the exogens and a few aberrant endogens; the Parallel, or Curved, found in all the higher endogens; and the Furcate, or Forked, characteristic of Ferns. Lindley made ten divisions: Veinless, Equal-veined, Straight-veined, Curve-veined, Netted, Ribbed, False-ribbed, Radiating, Feather-veined and Hidden-veined. Professors McCosh and Dickie considered that they had traced a connection between the ramifications of plants and their venation.

"The venders of card-matches."—Addison: Spectator, No. 251.

věnd-ět'-ta, subst. [Ital., from Latin vindicta=revenge.] [VINDICTIVE.]

Anthrop.: A particular case of the wider custom of blood-feud, by which every member of a stock, or body of men between whom blood-relationship subsists, is bound to aid in taking vengeance (on the offender if possible, or on the stock to which he belongs) for a personal injury done to any of his kinsmen. The vendetta which exists in Corsica, and to a less extent in Sicily, Sardinia, and Calabria, is the practice of taking vengeance on the murderer of a relative; and this duty is imposed primarily on the next of kin, but in a less degree on all the relatives of the murdered individual. If the murderer succeeds in eluding his pursuers, then vengeance may be taken on any of his relatives. Between 1770 and 1800, when the vendetta was at its height, some 7,000 murders are said to have occurred in Corsica owing to this practice of private vengeance. A law prohibiting the carrying of arms did much to put a stop to the vendetta, but the law is now repealed with the result that the number of murders is on the increase.

"It is now apparent that the vendetta represents a system which prevailed everywhere before the consolidation of society into the state, and the establishment of a police capable of protecting life and property. The system was a rude substitute for government and the administration of justice. The family, or the body of kindred, formed, in fact, a commonwealth of itself; its members held firmly together; and when one was injured all the little state was injured."—Chambers' Encyc. (ed. 1867), ix. 746.

[Hence applied to a private quarrel that can only be settled by the death of one of the parties concerned at the hands of the other.

"E—, a short-sighted, plucky, powerful fellow, fell out with J. D—. For some weeks it was known in Chicago that a meeting between them meant shooting. Later ambassadors between the pair were understood to have brought about a sort of reconciliation. The vendetta was to drop."—Referee, April 8, 1888.

Vĕ-nĕ'-tian, adj. & s. [Fr. venétien; Ital. veneziano; Sp. veneciano, from Lat. Venetia=the country of the Veneti.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the city or province of Venice, in Northern Italy.

B. As substantive:

1. A native or inhabitant of Venice.

2. A Venetian-blind. (Colloq.)

*3. (Pl.): A peculiar fashion of hose or breeches, originally introduced from Venice.

"To make venetians down below the garter."

Harington: Epigrams, i. 20.

Venetian-architecture, subst. A variety of the Gothic style, of which examples are found mainly in palaces which form a class apart among buildings constructed in the Italian Gothic style. In these palaces the arches of the windows and halls rest upon shafts, and terminate in intricate designs of open tracery work, as in the case of the celebrated Palace of the Doges. The arches have a wavy shape, which gives them an oriental appearance. The enrichments, moreover, display, as they usually do in Italy, different mode of treatment from that which prevails elsewhere in the Gothic style. The corners of the façades are marked by slender shafts twisted like cables. The moldings and cornice consist merely of narrow bands, which generally rest on consoles. A method of decoration peculiar to these buildings appears to have been borrowed from Byzantine models; fine marbles of various colors, of which red porphyry and green serpentine are the most frequent, are inserted in circular and angular panels and borderings, and form a sort of mosaic-work. This style of ornamentation is employed both in churches and palaces. [RENAISSANCE-ARCHITECTURE.]

Venetian-ball, s. An ornamental form of glass for paper-weights, &c. It consists of waste pieces of filigree-glass conglomerated together in a bulb of clear flint-glass.

Venetian Architecture.

Venetian-blind, s. A louver shutter or blind made of slats with spaces between them to admit air. In some cases the slats are fixed at a certain angle in the shutter; in other cases they are movable, to allow the passage of more or less air and light. The suspended blind has cords for support, and others for changing the positions of the slats.

Venetian-carpet, s. A carpet whose warp or chain is of worsted, and generally arranged in stripes of different colors. The shoot, which is generally black, is concealed, and the warp exposed on the two surfaces. The weft is sometimes of different colors, thus producing a plaid or check pattern. By the suitable arrangement of the heddles, a twill may be given. The ordinary loom suffices, as no figures are raised.

Venetian-chalk, subst. The same as FRENCH CHALK (q. v.).

Venetian-door, s. A door with long, narrow side-lights for lighting a lobby, entrance-hall, &c.

Venetian-glass, s. [VENETIAN-BALL.]

Venetian-red, s. True Venetian red is said to be a native ocher, but the colors sold under this name are prepared artificially from sulphate of iron, or its residuum in the manufacture of acids. They are all of redder and deeper hues than light red, are very permanent, and have all the properties of good ochers. Scarlet ocher, Prussian red, English red, and rouge de Mars are other names for the same pigment.

Venetian School, s.

Paint.: A school of painting which arose and declined in the sixteenth century, and of which Titian (1477-1576) is considered the founder. Among its other masters were Giorgione (1477-1511), Tintoretto (1512-1594), and Paul Veronese (1528-1581). The distinguishing characteristics of this school were a mastery of color and a consummate knowledge of chiaro-oscuro.

Venetian-white, s. A carefully-prepared carbonate of lead.

Venetian-window, subst. A window with three separate lights.

vën'-eý, *vën'-ný, *ven-ew, s. [VENUE.] An assault or attack in fencing, or the like; sometimes applied to a thrust or hit.

Venial discourse unblam'd."
Milton: P. L., ix. 5.

*B. As subst.: A venial sin or offense.

"And [it] gently blanches over the breaches of God's law, with the name of venials and favorable titles of diminution."—Ep. Hall: Dissuasive from Popery.

venial-sin, s.

Roman Theol.: A sin which is not against the end of the law, i. e., the love of God; a disease of the soul, not its death. Some sins, though mortal in their nature, are held to be venial if not done deliberately, and if the amount of harm done is small, e. g., in the case of small theft. There are two classes of venial sins, deliberate and indeliberate. Casuists speak with much caution on this subject, and declare that the distinction between mortal and venial sins in many cases must rest solely on the judgment of God. [MORTAL-SIN.]

vë'-ní-ál-i-tý, *ve-ni-al-i-tie, subst. [Eng. venial; -ity.] The quality or state of being venial, pardonable, or excusable.

vë-nir'-ë dë nõ'-võ, phr. [Lat.=to come anew or afresh.]

Law: (See extract).

"A venire de novo is the old common law mode of proceeding to a second trial, and differs materially from a new trial, which is granted only for matter entirely extrinsic of the record. It is where some defect appears on the face of the record itself that a venire de novo, as it is called, is awarded; this term being derived from the name of the ancient jury process, which, in this instance, was awarded afresh, or de novo. And this differs in effect also from a new trial, for here no costs can be given, nor conditions imposed on either party, it being ordinarily awarded where the finding of the verdict is defective."—Blackstone; Comment., bk. iii., ch. 14.

vë-nir'-ë fä'-çi-äs, vë-nir'-ë, phr. [That you cause to come.]

Law: A writ or precept directed to the sheriff requiring him to cause a jury to come or appear in the neighborhood where a cause is brought to issue to try the same.

"He drew off a thousand copies of a treatise, which not one in threescore can understand, can hardly exceed the vent of that number."—Pope: Letters. (Todd.)

2. Opportunity of selling; market.

"The king might dispend a thousand marks sterling a day, such vent of wools had the English merchants in that season."—Holinshead: Chron. Edw. III. (an. 1355).

3. An inn; a baiting-place. [VENTA.]

"He perceived an inn near the highway . . . As soon as he espied the vent, he feigned to himself that it was a castle with four turrets."—Shelton: Don Quixote.

vĕnt (1), v. t. & i. [VENT (1), s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To let out at a vent or small aperture; to emit; to give passage or outlet to.

"Where air comes out, air comes in; there's none abroad so wholesome as that you vent."—Shakesp.: Cymbeline, i. 2.

2. To keep no longer pent up in one's mind; to give vent to.

"That fatal distemper which has always taken a particular pleasure in venting its spite upon the nose."—Tatler, No. 260.

*3. To utter; to report; to publish.

"Their mind runs only after paradoxes; these they seek, these they embrace, these alone they vent."—Locke: Conduct of the Understanding, § 24.

*4. To put into circulation; to circulate.

"When he found ill money had been put into his hands, he would never suffer it to be vented again."—Burnet: Life of Hale.

*5. To scent, as a hound.

"When he [a hound] smelleth or venteth anything, we say he hath this or that in the wind."—Turberville.

B. Intrans.: To snuff; to snort; to snuff up or puff out air.

"A few amateurs, we are told, hunt the otter with dogs, which run it to ground, and when, after being driven out into the river, it rises to vent, it is immediately shot at."—Field, Jan. 23, 1886.

¶ To vent up: To raise so as to admit air.

"[She] only vented up her umbriere."

Spenser: F. Q., III. i. 42.

vĕnt (2), v. t. [VENT (2), s.] To sell; to vend.

"Therefore did those nations vent such spice, sweet gums, and pearls, as their own countries yielded."—Sir W. Raleigh.

vĕnt'-ta, s. [Sp.=a sale, a market, a mean roadside inn.] A mean inn; a roadside tavern. [VENT (2), s.] vĕnt'-age (age as ig), vĕnt'-ige, s. [Eng. vent (1), s.; -age.] A small hole for the passage of air; a vent.

"Govern these ventages with your finger and thumb."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 2.

vĕn'-tāil, ven-taile, ven-tayle, s. [O. Fr. ventaille, from vent (Latin ventus)=wind.] The lower movable part of the front of the helmet, which admitted air for breathing, the upper being the visor (q. v.). It succeeded the nasal of the eleventh century, and the term was afterward applied to all defenses of the face, whether a combination of the mail-hood or a plate attached to the front of the helmet.

"The wicked stroke . . .

Her ventaille shar'd away."

Spenser: F. Q., IV. vi. 19.

vĕnt'-al, adj. [Lat. ventus=wind.] Of or pertaining to the wind.

"The strange, vental eccentricities that had been occurring on our coasts."—Field, Nov. 14, 1887.

vĕn-tan'-na, vĕn-ta'-na, subst. [Sp. ventana from Lat. ventus=the wind.] A window.

"What after pass'd

Was far from the ventanna, where I sat,"

Dryden. (Todd.)

French Bascinet, with Closed Ventail.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

ven-tayle, s. [VENTAIL.]

věnt'-ēr (1), s. [Eng. vent (1), v.; -er.] One who vents or gives vent to anything; one who publishes, reports, or utters.

"The venter of them doth little skill the use of speech."
—Barrow: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 15.

věnt'-tēr (2), s. [Lat.=the belly.]

1. Anat.: Any large cavity containing viscera. Hence the head, the thorax, and the abdomen were called the Three Venters. The term was formerly applied to (1) the uterus; (2) the belly of a muscle; (3) the subscapular fossa, a shallow concavity on the anterior surface of the scapula. It receives the subscapular muscle.

2. Entom.: The lower part of the abdomen.

3. Law: The womb, and hence a mother.

"A has issue B a son and O a daughter by one venter, and D a son by another venter. If B purchases in fee, and dies without issue, it shall descend to the sister and not to the brother of the half blood."—Hale.

věnt'-tīc'-u-lar, a. [A dimin. from vent (1), s.] Consisting of small holes or vents.

"Distinguished from genuine examples by the so-called 'venticular perforations of the mezzail,' or breathing holes."—Athenæum, Oct. 14, 1882.

věnt'-tī-duct, s. [Lat. ventus=wind, and ductus=a passage; duco=to lead.]

Arch.: A passage for wind or air; a subterranean passage or pipe for ventilating apartments.

"Having been informed of divers ventiducts, I wish I had had the good fortune, when I was at Rome, to take notice of these organs."—Boyle.

věnt'-tīl, ven-tile, s. [Ger., from Lat. ventus=wind.]

Music:

(1) A valve, by means of which brass tubes may be made to sound the semitones and tones between the natural open harmonics.

(2) A mechanical contrivance on an organ for the purpose of cutting off the wind from a particular sound-board.

věnt'-tīl-ā'-gō, s. [Latin ventilo=to fan (ventus=the wind), and ago=to drive away. So named because the fruit is winged, and is scattered by the wind.]

Botany: A genus of Rhamnaceæ. Tall climbing shrubs with woody branches, leathery leaves, and small panicles of flowers. They are all from the tropics of the eastern hemisphere. Ventilago maderaspatana, an extensive climber, with green, offensively smelling flowers, a native of Central and Southern India and Burmah, is said to yield a gum. The root bark yields a red dye, orange and chocolate with Oldenlandia umbellata, and black with galls. The fibers of the bark constitute excellent cordage, and, according to Rumphius, the Amboyna fishermen employ the long stems instead of ropes.

věnt'-tī-lāte, ven-ty-late, v. t. [Lat. ventilatus, pa. par. of ventilo=to blow, to winnow, to ventilate, from ventus=wind; Fr. ventiler; Sp. & Port. ventilar.]

*1. To winnow, to fan; to remove chaff from.

2. To blow upon; to renew or refresh by blowing.

"Ventilate and warm the swelling buds."

Couper: Task, iii. 426.

3. To expose to the free passage of air or wind; to supply with fresh air and remove vitiated air from; as, to ventilate a room by opening the windows.

4. To expose to common or public talk or consideration; to allow to be discussed freely; to expose to examination and discussion.

"Much had been ventilated in private discourse."—Harington: Oceana, p. 213.

věnt'-tīl-ate, adj. [VENTILATE, v.] Discussed, considered, ventilated.

"Those counsayers . . . were before trayted, and (as I might say) ventilate."—Elyot: Governor, bk. i., ch. xxv.

věnt'-tīl-āt-īng, pr. par. or a. [VENTILATE, v.] ventilating-brick, s. A hollow brick (q. v.).

ventilating-heater, s. A form of stove in which the air is drawn fresh from the outside of the building, warmed in the passages of the stove, and discharged into the room.

věnt'-tīl-ā'-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. ventilationem, accus. of ventilatio, from ventilatus, pa. par. of ventilo=to ventilate (q. v.).]

*1. The act of fanning or blowing; the state of being fanned or blown on.

"The soil, worn with too frequent culture, must lie fallow, till it has recruited its exhausted salts, and again enriched itself by the ventilations of the air."—Addison.

2. The act of ventilating; the state of being ventilated; the process of removing vitiated air from and supplying fresh air to rooms, buildings, mines, and other confined places, so as to maintain the atmosphere in such places in a constant state of purity. This may be effected either by withdrawing the foul air and permitting the fresh air to flow in and supply its place (the vacuum process); or by forcing in fresh air (the plenum process), which drives the foul air before it to the exit. A combination of both processes is also used in certain cases.

"In the ventilation of mines, a series of shafts, termed winzes, are sunk from one level to another, permitting the ascent of the more highly heated air from below, causing an ascending current; and the descent of the cooler air from outside, which traverses the various galleries, is usually found sufficient. In coal or other mines where large quantities of dangerous gases are generated, this method is inadequate, and artificial means are resorted to to produce a more powerful ascending current, and cause a more rapid circulation of air. The most simple means of doing this, and that generally employed in coal mines, is by means of two shafts, in one of which a fire is kept up, rarefying the air, and producing a strong draught, which causes the withdrawal of the air from the set of galleries with which this, the upcast shaft, is connected."—Knight: Dict. Mechanics.

*3. The act or process of refrigerating or cooling; refrigeration.

"Procure the blood a free course, ventilation, and transpiration, by suitable and ephractic purges."—Harvey.

*4. Vent, utterance.

"To his secretary, Dr. Mason, whom he let lie in a pallet near him, for natural ventilation of his thoughts, he would break out into bitter eruptions."—Wotton: Life of Duke of Buckingham.

5. Public examination; open or free discussion.

"The ventilation which this superlatively important subject is receiving."—Field, Dec. 31, 1887.

věnt'-tī-lāt-ive, a. [Eng. ventilat(e); -ive.] Of or pertaining to ventilation; producing ventilation; as, ventilative appliances.

věnt'-tī-lāt-ōr, s. [Lat.=a winnower, from ventilatus, pa. par. of ventilo=to ventilate.] An arrangement for supplying fresh and removing vitiated air from buildings, mines, and other confined spaces; specif., an apparatus made to turn with the wind, and placed in a wall or roof, in order to throw a due quantity of fresh air into a close apartment or a mine. The ventilator for stacks, mows, and granaries consists of a perforated air-duct which allows the heated air and moisture to pass off. The ventilator for ships is commonly a wind-sail (q. v.).

věnt'-īng, pr. par. or a. [VENT (1), v.]

venting-hole, s. A vent-hole.

"Certain out-casts, tunnels, or venting-holes."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxxi., ch. iii.

věnt'-lēss, a. [Eng. vent (1), s.; -less.] Having no vent or outlet.

"A restless, ventlesse flame of fire."

Davies: Microcosmos, p. 61.

věnt'-tōse, a. [Lat. ventosus, from ventus=wind.] Windy, flatulent.

věnt'-tōse (1), s. [Fr. ventouse, from Lat. ventosa cucurbita=a cupping-glass, from ventus=wind.] A cupping-glass.

"They have certaine hollow concavities dispeared within their clawes or armes like to ventoses or cupping-glasses."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. ix., ch. xxix.

Věnt'-tōse (2), s. [French, from Lat. ventosus=windy, from ventus=wind.] The name adopted in October, 1793, by the French Convention for the sixth month of the Republican year. It commenced on Feb. 19, and was the third winter month.

věnt'-tōs'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. ventos(e), a.; -ity.]

1. Lit.: Windiness, flatulence.

"Democritus banished turneps altogether from the board, by reason of the ventosities or windiness that it engendreth."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xx., ch. iii.

2. Fig.: Empty pride or boasting; vainglory. (Bacon.)

věnt'-tōus-īng, s. [VENTOSE (1), s.] The act or process of cupping.

"Neither veine-blode, nor ventousing, Ne drinke of herbes may ben his helping."

Chaucer: C. T., 2,750.

věnt'-tral, a. [Lat. ventralis, from venter (genit. ventris)=the belly.]

1. Anat.: Of or pertaining to the belly, or to the surface of the body opposite to the dorsal side or back; as, ventral muscles.

2. Bot.: Belonging to the anterior surface of anything.

ventral-fins, s. pl.

Ichthy.: Paired or horizontal fins, inserted on the abdominal surface, behind, below, or in advance of the pectoral fins, whence they are called abdominal, thoracic, or jugular ventral fins respectively. They are generally narrow, composed of a small number of rays, the outer of which is ordinarily bony. In some genera of the Gobiidæ, the ventral fins are united and form a suction disc.

ventral-suture, s. [SUTURE, s., II. 2.]

věnt'-trīc, a. [VENTRICOUS.] Of or pertaining to the stomach.

"Magister artis . . . venter," says Persius [Prolog. 10, 11], the art of accurate time-keeping is ventric."—M. Collins: Thoughts in my Garden, i. 41.

věnt'-trī-cle, s. [Fr. ventricule, from Latin ventriculum, accus. of ventriculus=(1) the stomach, (2) a ventricle; double dimin. from venter (genit. ventris)=the belly.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A small cavity in an animal body; a place of organic function.

"Herophilus [places the soul] within the ventricle or concavity of the brain, which also is the basis or foundation of it."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 683.

*2. The stomach.

"Whether I will or not, while I live my heart beats, and my ventricle digests what is in it."—Hale.

II. Anat.: The name given to various cavities smaller than that of the stomach. [¶.] Thus the cerebrum has several ventricles, and the cerebellum one. Among these are the right and left lateral ventricles. The third ventricle is a narrow longitudinal cleft placed between the optic thalami of the cerebrum. The fourth, called also the ventricle of the cerebellum, occupies the space between the medulla oblongata in front and the cerebrum behind. The fifth, called also the ventricle of the septum, or sylvian ventricle, is situated between two laminae of the septum lucidum, a thin transparent partition placed between the two lateral ventricles.

¶ Ventricles of the heart:

Anat.: Two of the four cavities into which the heart is divided. They are called the right and the left ventricles. The right or anterior ventricle occupies most of the anterior surface of the right border and a smaller part of the posterior surface. The upper and left angle, called the arterial cone or infundibulum, is prolonged in a conical form to the commencement of the pulmonary artery. The muscular wall of the right ventricle is thickest at the base, and becomes thinner toward the apex. At its base are two orifices: The auriculo-ventricular orifice, protected by the tricuspid valve, and that of the pulmonary artery, protected by the semilunar or sigmoid valves. The left or posterior ventricle occupies the left border of the heart, about a third of its extent appearing on the anterior surface, the rest being visible behind. It is longer and narrower than the right ventricle, and oval in cross-section. Its walls, except near the apex, are three times as thick as those of the right ventricle. Its two orifices are very close together. One is the left auricular, the other the aortic opening, the former protected by the bicuspid or mitral, the latter by another semilunar or sigmoid valve, while the two are separated only by the attachment of the anterior segment of the mitral valve. The ventricles receive the blood from the auricles, and transmit it to the lungs and through the aorta to the body generally. [HEART, II. 2. (1).]

věnt'-trīc-ōus, věnt'-trīc-ōse, adj. [Low Latin ventricosus, from Lat. venter (genit. ventris)=the belly.]

I. Ord. Lang. (of both forms): Resembling the belly; hence, swelled out, distended.

II. Bot. (of the form ventricose): Inflated. [BEL-LYING, B. 2.]

věnt'-trīc'-u-lar, adj. [Eng. ventricul(e); -ar.] Pertaining to or resembling a ventricle; distended in the middle; bellied.

"The general ventricular space within the cerebrum."—Quain: Anat. (ed 8th), ii. 539.

věnt'-trīc'-u-lite, s. [VENTRICULITES.] Any individual of the genus Ventriculites.

věnt'-trīc'-u-līt-ēs, s. pl. [Latin, dimin. from venter=the belly.]

Palæont.: The typical genus of Ventriculitidæ (q. v.). Characteristic of the Chalk.

věnt'-trīc'-u-lī'-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. ventriculit(es); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: Shaped, simple or compound. Cup, funnel or top-shaped, cylindrical or ramose. Wall in meandrous folds, spicular nodes octohedral; radial canals blind. The outer or under surface of the sponge with elongate apertures or vents, the inner or upper surface either similar to the lower or with circular vents. Dermal layer a cribriform siliceous membrane. Root-appendage of fasciculate siliceous fibers, united by transverse extensions, and without axial canals. (Hinde in Palæontographical Society's vol. for 1886.) They reach their maximum in the Cretaceous rocks. Only one genus now survives.

věnt'-trīc'-u-loūs, adj. [Eng. ventricul(e); -ous.] The same as VENTRICULAR (q. v.).

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhñ; -tion, -şion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

věn-trí-lō-cū'-tion, subst. [Lat. venter (genit. ventris)=the belly, and Eng. locution.] A speaking after the manner of a ventriloquist; ventriloquism.

věn'-trí-lōque (quask), věn-trí-lō'-quǐ-əl, a. [Lat. ventriloquus=a ventriloquist; venter (genit. ventris)=the belly, and loquor=to speak.] Pertaining to ventriloquism.

"Followed by a faint kind of ventriloquial chirping."
—Dickens: Sketches by Boz; Mistaken Milliner.

věn-tríl'-ō-quǐsm, s. [Eng. ventriloqu(y); -ism.] The act or art of speaking in such a manner as to cause the hearers to believe that the sound comes not from the person speaking, but from a different source. The name originated from the erroneous supposition that the sounds uttered were formed in the belly, whereas they are formed by the same organs as the emissions of sound commonly, viz., the larynx, the palate, the tongue, the lips, &c., only that to increase the illusion the performer moves the lips as little as possible. The art of ventriloquism depends mainly on two things: (1) The power of appreciating the value of sounds at certain given distances, or when hindered by obstacles; (2) The power of imitating or reproducing the diminished value of such sounds. Thus, to represent a man speaking outside a window, the ventriloquist should know exactly the value of such sounds inside a room if actually produced outside, and also be able to reproduce them by accurate imitation. The art of ventriloquism was known to the ancient Greeks and Romans.

věn-tríl'-ō-quǐst, s. [Eng. ventriloqu(y); -ist.] One who practices or is skilled in the art of ventriloquism; one who speaks so as to cause his voice to appear to come from some other quarter.

"A tuneful bird is a ventriloquist."—Paley: Nat. Theology, ch. x.

věn-tríl'-ō-quǐs'-tíc, adj. [English ventriloquist; -ic.] Pertaining to ventriloquism or ventriloquists; ventriloquial.

věn-tríl'-ō-quǐze, v. i. [English ventriloqu(y); -ize.] To practice ventriloquism; to speak after the manner of a ventriloquist.

věn-tríl'-ō-quǐs, adj. [Latin ventriloquus.] [VENTRILIQUE.] Speaking after the manner of a ventriloquist; ventriloquial.

"In the same tract, chap. 6, is this observation of ventriloquous persons."—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. iv., ch. vii.

věn-tríl'-ō-quǐ, s. [Lat. ventriloquus.] [VENTRILIQUE.] Ventriloquism.

věn-trō-, pref. [Lat. venter (genit. ventris)=the belly.] Anat.: Of, pertaining to, or connected with the belly.

Anatomy: Of or pertaining to the belly and the groin; as, ventro-inguinal hernia.

ventro-lateral, s.

Anat.: Of or pertaining to the belly and the side; as, ventro-lateral muscles.

věn'-ture, venter, subst. [An abbreviation of aventure, or adventure (q. v.).]

1. An undertaking of chance, risk, or danger; the hazard or risking of something upon an event, the result of which cannot be clearly foreseen; the undertaking of chance and risk; a trial of one's chance or of an issue; hazard, risk.

"I cannot lose much by the venture, sure."

Beaum. & Flet.: Noble Gentleman, iv. 1.

2. Specifically, a commercial speculation or enterprise; a pecuniary risk.

3. That which is put to hazard or risk; that which is staked; a stake, a risk; especially something sent abroad in trade.

"We must take the current when it serves,

Or lose our venture."

Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, iv. 3.

4. A chance occurrence, an accident; chance, hap, contingency.

"The king resolved with all speed to assail the rebels, and yet with that providence and surety as should leave little to venture or fortune."—Bacon.

¶ At a venture. An improper spelling of at adventure, at adventure = at hazard, at random, on chance.

"A certain man drew a bow at a venture." 1 Kings xxii. 34.

věn'-ture, v. t. & i. [VENTURE, s.]

*4. To confide in; to rely on; to trust; to risk one's self with.

"To buy silks of one whom he would not venture to feel his pulse."—Addison.

B. Intransitive:

1. To hazard one's self; to dare; to have the courage or presumption to do, undertake, or say.

"Whosoever ventured in must needs gore themselves upon the sharp pointes of the stakes."—Golding: Cæsar, fo. 225.

2. To try a chance, hazard, or risk; to run all risks.

"Before you venture for me."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iii. 2.

¶ To venture at, on, or upon: To dare to enter upon or engage in; to take or run the risk of.

"It was impossible to think of venturing upon this passage."—Anson: Voyages, bk. ii., ch. vii.

věn'-tu-rēr, věn'-tēr-ēr, s. [An abbreviation of adventurer (q. v.).]

1. One who ventures, hazards or risks; an adventurer.

"Remember, you're all venturers, and in this play

How many twelve-pence ye have 'stow'd this day."

Beaum. & Flet.: Mad Lover. (Prol.)

2. A prostitute, a strumpet.

věn'-ture-sōme, a. [Eng. venture; -some.]

1. Inclined to venture; venturous, bold, daring.

2. Risky, hazardous, bold.

"That bold and venturesome act of his,"—Styree: Eccles. Mem.; Henry VIII. (an. 1546).

věn'-ture-sōme-lý, adverb. [Eng. venturesome; -ly.] In a venturesome, bold, or daring manner.

věn'-ture-sōme-něss, subst. [Eng. venturesome; -ness.] The quality or state of being venturesome; riskiness, boldness.

"As far as Europe is concerned, the venturesomeness of travel has been for some years past steadily on the decrease."—London Daily Telegraph.

věn'-tu-rīne, subst. [AVANTURINE.] Powdered gold used in jappanning to cover varnished surfaces.

věn'-tu-rōus, věn'-trōus, s. [An abbreviation of adventurous (q. v.).] Daring, bold, venturesome, adventurous.

"The vent'rous knight is from the saddle thrown."

Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, iii.

věn'-tu-rōus-lý, věn'-trōus-lý, adverb. [Eng. venturous; -ly.] In a venturous, bold, daring, or venturesome manner.

"How men durst die so ventrously except they are sure they died well."—Hales: Remains; Sermon on Numbers xxxv. 33.

věn'-tu-rōus-něss, s. [Eng. venturous; -ness.] The quality or state of being venturous, daring, or venturesome; daring, fearlessness.

"Her coming into the place, where the walls and ceilings were whited over, much offended her sight, and made her repent her vent'rousness."—Boyle: Works, i. 673.

věn'-ue, věn'-ew (ew as u), věn'-ný, s. [Fr. venue=a coming, an arrival, a thrust in fencing; prop. fem. of venu, pa. par. of venir (Lat. venio)=to come.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A thrust or hit received in a contest with swords or cudgels; a turn or bout of fencing or cudgel-play.

"Preventing the venue of their stroke."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 407.

2. Fig.: A combat, a trial of skill.

"A quick venue of wit."—Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 1.

II. Law: The place where an action is laid. In the United States, the county in which the trial of a particular cause takes place is said to be the venue of that trial. In local actions, as for damages for an actual trespass, or for waste, &c., affecting land, the plaintiff must lay his declaration, or declare his injury to have happened in the very county and place that it really did happen; but in transitory actions, for injuries that might have happened anywhere, as debt, detinue, slander, and the like, the plaintiff may declare in what county he pleases, and then the trial must be had in that county in which the declaration is laid.

¶ 1. To lay a venue: To allege or fix a place of trial.

2. To pray a change of venue: To petition that a cause may be tried before another judge or in another place than the one first selected.

věn'-úle, s. [Latin venula, dimin. from vena=a vein.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: A small vein.

2. Bot.: A veinlet (q. v.).

věn'-u-líte, s. [Mod. Lat. venus, and Gr. lithos=a stone.]

Palæont.: A fossil of, or akin to, the genus Venus (q. v.).

věn'-u-lōse, a. [Eng. venul(e); -ose.]

Bot.: Full of small veins.

venulose-hinoid, a.

Bot.: The same as Hinoid (q. v.). (Link.)

Věn'-nūs, subst. [Lat.=the goddess of love, love; allied to Sansc. van=to love; Eng. win.]

1. Roman Mythol.: The goddess of beauty and love, and more especially of sensual love, her principal seats being the islands of Cyprus and Cythera. This goddess is generally supposed to have been of eastern origin, and to have been the same as the Phœnician Astarte. Before her identification with the Greek Aphrodite, the daughter of Zeus and Dione, who, according to some accounts, arose from the foam of the sea, Venus was one of the least important divinities (Macrob.: Sat. i. 12.) The Romans regarded her as the progenitress of their nation, which was fabled to have sprung from Æneas, the offspring of her union with the Trojan Anchises. She was married to Vulcan, but was not remarkable for fidelity to her husband, and her armour with Adonis has been celebrated by classic poets and by Shakespeare. The rose, myrtle, and apple were sacred to her; among birds, the dove, swan, and sparrow were her favorites. She is generally represented with her son Cupid in a chariot drawn by doves, or, at other times, by swans or sparrows. Among the most famous statues of Venus are the Venus of Cnidus, by Praxiteles (of which the Venus de Medici, found at Tivoli, is supposed to be a copy), the Venus of Capua, and the Venus of Milo or Milos, found in the island of Milos. In the best days of art she was always represented as draped, in later times nude.

2. Astron.: The second of the known inferior planets, if the arrangement be made according to their relative distances from the sun. With the exception of the moon, Venus is the nearest of all the heavenly bodies to the earth, and, when near its extreme eastern or western elongation, is much brighter than even the largest of the fixed stars. It stands first in this respect also of all the planets, the nearest approach to it being that made at certain times by Jupiter. When Venus is at its maximum of brightness, it can sometimes be seen by the naked eye in sunlight within an hour of noon. Its comparative nearness to the sun causes it to be for six months a morning and for the other six months an evening star. In the first state, it is the Lucifer of the Latins and the Phosphor of the Greeks; in the latter, it is the Hesperus of classical antiquity and of modern poetry. It undergoes phases like the moon. Father Castelli, a famous Florentine philosopher, reasoned this out, and, questioning Galileo on the subject, induced him to look with his telescope and see. On December 30, 1610, he was able to announce to Castelli that the phases had been actually discerned. They are not visible to the naked eye, to which the planet is simply a brilliant speck, too small to reveal its actual form, which is much more globular than that of the earth. Its diameter is about 7,826 miles, or about 93 miles less than that of the earth. Were man placed on the surface of Venus, the earth would look a trifle larger and brighter than Venus does to us in our sky. The mass of Venus is about three-quarters that of the earth, or $\frac{3}{4}$ that of the sun; its density is about 0.850 that of the earth; its specific gravity 4.81, as against 5.66, that of the earth. While a stone falling toward the earth passes through a little more than sixteen feet in the first second, it would, if falling to the surface of Venus, pass through about thirteen feet only in the same time. The excessive brightness of Venus makes the time of its rotation somewhat doubtful; it is provisionally placed at 23 hours 21'. Its mean distance from the sun is 67,000,000, its greatest distance 67,500,000, and its least 66,600,000 of miles. These numbers show that its orbit departs but slightly from a circle. Its periodic time is 224.7 mean solar days. Observation on the passage of the planet over the sun's disc is the best method of ascertaining the distance of the great luminary [TRANSIT]; it has also revealed the fact that Venus has an atmosphere, but its composition is as yet uncertain. Old observers thought they detected a satellite; modern astronomers have not confirmed this view, and believe it to have been founded on optical delusion.

3. Her.: The green tincture in coat-armour when borne by princes; vert.

*4. Old Chem.: A name given to copper.

5. Zool. & Palæont.: The type-genus of Veneridæ (q. v.), with 176 recent species, universally distributed, from low water to 140 fathoms. Shell is thick, ovate, smooth, sulcated, or cancellated;

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pîne, pît, sîre, sîr, marîne; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, râle, fûll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw.

margins minutely crenellated; hinge teeth 3-3; pallial sinus small, angular; ligament prominent, lunule distinct. Animal with mantle-margins fringed; siphons unequal, more or less separate; foot tongue-shaped. All the species are edible. Venus mercenaria is known on the east coast of North America as the Round Clam, and from the sea-worn fragments of the shell of this species the Red Indians used to make coinage, by perforating and stringing them on leather thongs. Fossil species 200, from the Oolite onward.

Venus's basin, bath, or cup, s.

Bot.: Dipsacus sylvestris. [TEASEL.]

Venus's basket, s.

Zoölogy: A popular name for any species of the genus Euplectella (q. v.). Called also Venus's Flower-basket. The species figured is Euplectella suberea, from the Philippines.

Venus's comb, s.

1. Bot.: Scandix Pecten-Veneris. [SCANDIX.] So named because the slender, tapering beaks of the seed-vessels are set together like the teeth of a comb.

2. Zoöl.: Murex tribulus, a beautiful and delicate shell, with long thin spines, from the Indian Ocean.

Venus's fan, s.

Zoöl.: Gorgonia flabellum, a much branched and reticulated zoöphyte, which has been found, but only accidentally, on the British coast.

Venus's fly-trap, s. [DIONÆA.]

Venus's girdle, s.

Zoöl.: Cestum veneris, a free-swimming Hydrozoön, from the Mediterranean. It is a long, narrow, strongly-compressed, active creature, covered with cilia, and swims with a graceful undulatory motion.

Venus's hair, s.

Botany: Adiantum capillus-veneris. [ADIANTUM, MAIDEN-HAIR.]

Venus's looking-glass, s.

Bot.: Specularia speculum; a Campanula-like plant, with purple flowers, from continental Europe.

Venus's navel-wort, s.

Bot.: The genus Omphalodes (q. v.).

Venus's slipper, s.

Zoöl.: The genus Carinaria (q. v.).

vě-nũ'-šĩ-a, subst. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. Venus (q. v.).]

Entomology: A genus of Geometer Moths, family Acidaliæ. Antennæ of the male slightly pectinated; abdomen slender; wings entire, rounded.

vě-nũst', adj. [Latin venustus, from venus=beauty.] Beautiful, amiable.

"As the infancy of Rome was venust, so was its manhood notably strenuous."—Waterhouse: Comment., Fortescue, p. 187.

*ven-ym, *ven-yme, s. [VENOM, s. & v.]

vě-prěc'-ũ-læ, s. pl. [Lat., pl. of veprecula=a little thorn or briar bush, dimin. from vepres=a thorn-bush.]

Bot.: The fifty-fourth order in Linnæus' Natural System. Genera: Rhamnus, Lycium, Daphne, &c.

*věr, s. [Lat.] The spring. (Chaucer.)

vě-r'-a, adv. [VERY.] (Scotch.)

vě-rā'-ci-ous, a. [Latin verax (genit. veracis), from verus=true.]

1. Observant of truth; habitually speaking the truth.

"The Spirit is most perfectly and absolutely veracious."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 34.

2. Characterized by truth and accuracy; true; as, a veracious account.

*3. Leading to or reporting actual facts.

vě-rā'-ci-ous-lỹ, adv. [Eng. veracious; -ly.] In a veracious manner; with truth; truthfully.

vě-rāç'-ĩ-tỹ, s. [Latin veracitas, from verax=veracious (q. v.).]

1. The quality or state of being truthful or observant of truth; habitual regard or observance of truth; truthfulness, truth.

"His veracity and unchangeableness secure our trust in him."—Clarke: Evidences, prop. 1.

2. Consistency of report with truth or fact; agreement with facts; truth.

"There was no reason to doubt the veracity of those facts which they related."—Addison.

*3. That which is true; that in which truth lies; truth. (Carlyle.)

ve-ra-ment, adv. [O. Fr. veraiment.] [VERY.] Truly, really.

Venus's Basket.

vě-rān'-dā, vě-rān'-dah, *fe-ran da, s. [Port. varanda=a balcony; O. Sp. baranda, from vara=a rod; or from Pers. bar-āmadah=a porch, a terrace, a balcony, from bar-āmadan=to ascend, to arise, to emerge, to grow out, from bar=up, and āmadan=to come, to arrive; or from Sansc. var-anda=a portico, from vi=to cover.] An open portico attached to a house; a sort of light external gallery in the front of a house, having a sloping roof supported by slender pillars, and frequently partly enclosed in front with lattice-work.

"Uppercross Cottage, with its veranda, French windows, and other prettinesses."—Miss Austen: Persuasion, ch. v.

vě-rā'-trāte, s. [Eng. veratr(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of veratric acid (q. v.).

vě-rā'-trě-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. veratr(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æa.]

Bot.: A tribe of Melanthaceæ. Divisions of the perianth free, sessile, shortly unguiculate, or cohering into a short tube.

vě-rā'-trĩ-a, s. [VERATRINE.]

vě-rā'-trĩc, a. [English veratr(ine); -ic.] Contained in or derived from Veratrum sabadilla.

veratric-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_9H_{10}O_4 = C_6H_3(OCH_3)_2CO\cdot OH$. A monobasic acid discovered by Merck, in 1839, in sabadilla seeds. It is prepared by exhausting the bruised seeds with alcohol containing sulphuric acid, neutralizing with milk of lime, filtering and evaporating the filtrate to dryness. It crystallizes in colorless four-sided prisms, slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol, but insoluble in ether. Heated to 100° it gives off water and becomes opaque; at a higher temperature it melts, and sublimates without decomposition.

vě-r'-a-trĩn, s. [Eng. veratr(um); -in.]

Chem.: Veratrum-resin (q. v.).

vě-r'-a-trĩne, s. [Eng. veratr(um); -ine.]

Chem.: $C_{32}H_{52}N_2O_8$. Veratria. An organic base discovered by Meissner, in 1818, in sabadilla seeds, and readily obtained by boiling the bruised seeds in strong alcohol, and precipitating by an alkali. In its pure state it is a white or greenish-white crystalline powder, inodorous, insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, and very poisonous; melts at 115°, and solidifies on cooling to a resinous mass. Strong sulphuric acid colors it first yellow, then carmine red, and lastly violet. It dissolves in dilute acids, forming colorless salts, which are very poisonous.

vě-r'-a-trĩl, s. [Eng. veratr(ic); -ol.]

Chem.: $C_8H_{10}O_2$. A colorless oil obtained by distilling veratric acid with excess of baryta. It has an agreeable, aromatic odor, specific gravity 1.086 at 15°, solidifies at 15°, and boils at 202°-205°.

vě-rā'-trũm, subst. [Latin=a plant, Veratrum album.]

1. Bot.: The typical genus of Veratræ. Perianth of six equal divisions, sessile, persistent; stamens six, springing from the perianth; styles three, persistent; stigmas three, spreading; capsules three; seeds numerous. Plants with perennial roots, erect stems, ovate pointed leaves, and panicles of polygamous flowers. Natives of Europe and North America. Veratrum album is the White Hellebore. The stem is two to four or five feet high, the peduncles downy, the flowers in a thrice-compound panicle. It grows in the Alps of Switzerland and Savoy and in the Pyrenees. It is a powerful emetic and drastic purgative, formerly given in mania, epilepsy, &c.; externally it is used in itch. Another European species is V. nigrum, the Dark-flowered Veratrum. V. viride is the Green or American Hellebore, found on the east coast of North America, from Canada to Carolina. It is called also the Poke-root and the Swamp Hellebore. The rhizome is a powerful cardiac, arterial, and nervous sedative, lowering the pulse, the respiration, and the heat of the body. It is used in pneumonia, rheumatism, gout, neuralgia, asthma, and in some cardiac affections. V. sabadilla, a Mexican and West Indian species, was formerly believed to yield Cevadilla (q. v.).

2. Pharm.:

The rhizome of Veratrum album. [1.]

veratrum-resin, s.

Chem.: $C_{14}H_{36}N_2O_3(?)$. Veratrin. A brownish resin, extracted from sabadilla seeds. It is insoluble in water, ether, and alkalies, soluble in alcohol, melts at 185°, and decomposes at a higher temperature.

věrb, *verbe, s. [Fr. verbe, from Lat. verbum=a word, a verb; cognate with Eng. word (q. v.).]

*I. Ord. Lang.:

A word.

"In whiche speache, the verbe that cuppleth the wordes [fleshe] and [meat] together: knitteth them together in their propre signification."—Bp. Gardner: Explication, fol. 8.

II. Gram.: That part of speech which predicates something in regard to something else (the subject or thing spoken of); as, The man lives. The boy threw a stone. Verbs affirm action or existence of a subject under certain conditions or relations called voice, mood, and tense. (See these words.) Verbs may be classified into: (1) Transitive, requiring an object, as, He learns his lesson; and (2) Intransitive, as, He runs. [ACTIVE, PASSIVE, TRANSITIVE, INTRANSITIVE.] Transitive verbs include reflexive verbs. [REFLEXIVE.] Some transitive verbs are reflexive in meaning though not in form, and appear, at first sight, as if used intransitively; as, He keeps out of danger, i. e., He keeps himself, &c. Sometimes a transitive verb has a passive sense with an active form; as, The cakes ate short and crisp. Some verbs are sometimes transitive and sometimes intransitive; as, He floats a scheme. The body floats. Only transitive verbs have a passive voice. Some intransitive verbs, by means of a preposition, become transitive, and may be used passively; as, He laughed at the act, The act was laughed at by him. Intransitive verbs include a large number that might be classed as frequentative, diminutive, inceptive, desiderative, &c. Some intransitive verbs have a causative meaning, and take an object: I run, I take a pin into my finger. Intransitive verbs may take a noun of kindred meaning as object (called the cognate object); as, to sleep a sleep, to run a race, to live a life. Verbs used with the third person only are called impersonal verbs; as, methinks, it rains, it snows. In the case of some verbs, the transitive form is distinguished from the corresponding intransitive by a change of vowel; as, raise, rise; set, sit; fell, fall. Such verbs are called causative (q. v.). The past tense of strong verbs is expressed by a change of vowel only; as, throw, threw; the past tense of weak verbs by adding to the verbal root the syllable -ed; as, shout, shouted; or its euphonic substitute d (-ed); as love, loved. [STRONG, WEAK.] Auxiliary verbs are used in forming the tenses of other verbs; as, I have seen. [AUXILIARY.]

"You have told me that a verb is (as every word also must be) a noun; but you added, that it is also something more; and that the title of verb was given to it on account of that distinguishing something more than the mere nouns convey."—Tooke: Diversions of Purley, pt. ii., ch. viii.

vě-r'-bāl, *věr'-ball, a. & s. [Fr. verbal, from Lat. verbalis=pertaining to a word, from verbum=a word, a verb; Sp. & Port. verbal; Ital. verbale.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ordinary Language:

*1. Of or pertaining to words; respecting words only; as, a verbal dispute.

2. Spoken; expressed to the ear in words; not written; oral. (Shakesp.: Lear, iv. 3.)

*3. Consisting in mere words.

"Great acclamations and verbal praises . . . are but a piece of mockery and hypocritical compliment."—Hale: Cont.; Of Afflictions.

4. Literal; having word answering to word.

"Whosoever offers at verbal translation, shall have the misfortune of that young traveler, who lost his own language abroad, and brought home no other instead of it."—Denham.

5. Minutely exact in words; attending to words only.

"Neglect the rules each verbal critic lays."

Pope: Essay on Criticism, 261.

*6. Plain-spoken; wording one's thoughts without reserve.

"You put me to forget a lady's manners, By being so verbal."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, ii. 3.

II. Grammar:

1. Derived from a verb. The infinitive mood, gerund, and supine are properly verbal nouns, implying action or state, only without the power of assertion.

2. Pertaining to a verb or verbs.

B. As substantive:

Gram.: A noun derived from a verb.

verbal-note, s.

Diplomacy: An unsigned memorandum or note when an affair has continued for a long time without any reply. It is designed to show that the matter is not urgent, but that at the same time it has not been overlooked.

vě-r'-bāl-ĩsm, s. [Eng. verbal; -ism.] Something expressed verbally or orally; a verbal remark or expression.

vě-r'-bāl-ĩst, s. [Eng. verbal; -ist.] One who deals in words only; a literal adherent to, or a minute critic of words; a verbarian.

"Yet not ashamed these verbalists still use From youth, till age or study dims their eyes, To engage the grammar rules in civil war."

Lord Brooke: On Human Learning.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, țhis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shũn. -țion, -șion = zhũn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shũs. -ble, -dle. &c. = bēl, dēl.

vēr-baĭ'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. verbal; -ity.] The quality or state of being verbal; mere words; bare literal expression.

vēr-baĭ'-ī-zā'-tion, s. [Eng. verbaliz(e); -ation.] The act of verbalizing; the state of being verbalized.

vēr'-baĭ-ize, v. t. & i. [Eng. verbal; -ize.]

A. Trans.: To convert or change into a verb; to form a verb of.

"Nouns for brevity, are sometimes verbalized; as, to complete, to contrary, to experience."—Instructions for Oratory, p. 81.

*B. Intrans.: To use many words; to be verbose or diffuse.

vēr'-baĭ-lŷ, adv. [Eng. verbal; -ly.]

1. In a verbal manner; by word of mouth; orally; by words uttered; in words.

"Would God I might not say, even the Lord's anointed, whom they verbally professe to honor."—Ep. Hall: Episc. by Divine Right, pt. iii., § 8.

2. Word for word; literally, verbatim.

"'Tis almost impossible to translate verbally, and well, at the same time."—Dryden. (Todd.)

vēr-bār'-ī-an, subst. [Latin verbum=a word.] A word-coiner.

"In 'The Doctor,' Southey gives himself free scope as a verbarian."—Fitzedward Hall: Modern English, p. 21.

vēr-bās'-ċē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin verbascum]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Antirrhinidæ. Leaves alternate; inflorescence centripetal; corolla rotate; stamens five, declinate, unequal.

vēr-bās'-cūm, s. [Lat.=mullein. See def.]

Botany: Mullein, the typical genus of Verbasceæ (q. v.). Tall, erect, tomentose or woolly plants, usually biennial. Leaves alternate; inflorescence in racemes; calyx five-partite; corolla rotate or regular; stamens five, the three upper ones or all five hairy; capsule of two cells and two valves, septicidal; seeds many. Known species about eighty, chiefly from Europe and Asia. The flowers of the Great Mullein, when dried in the sun, give out a fatty matter, used in Alsace as a cataplasm in hæmorrhoids. Its root is administered in India as a febrifuge. The seeds of V. thapsus and V. nigrum are used by poachers to poison fish, and the flowers of V. lychnitis to destroy mice.

vēr-bā'-tīm, adv. [Lat.]

1. Word for word; in the identical words.

"He could verbatim repeat the whole without booke."—Holinshed: Chron. (Epis. Ded.)

2. By word of mouth; orally.

"Verbatim to rehearse the method of my pen."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., iii. 1.

¶ Verbatim et literatim: [LITERATIM.]

vēr-bē'-nā, s. [Latin verbenæ=sacred boughs; verbenaca=vervain.]

Bot.: Vervain; the typical genus of Verbenacæ (q. v.). Herbs or undershrubs with four-sided stems, opposite or ternate leaves, simple, pinnatifid, or three-partite. Flowers in terminal spikes or racemes. Calyx tubular, the limb with five teeth, one usually shorter than the rest. Corolla tubular, the limb not quite regular, five-cleft. Stamens included, four didynamous, rarely two. Ovary with four cells, each one-seeded. Capsule dividing into four one-seeded achenes. Known species seventy, chiefly from America. Popularly the name is used in a wider sense than the scientific genus; as the Lemon-scented Verbena. [ALOYSIA.]

vēr-bē-nā'-ċē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin verben(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: Verbenes; an order of Perigynous Exogens, alliance Echiales. Trees, shrubs, or herbs. Leaves generally opposite, simple or compound, without stipules. Flowers in opposite corymbs, or spiked alternately, or in dense heads, or rarely axillary and solitary. Calyx tubular, persistent, inferior. Corolla hypogynous, monopetalous, tubular, deciduous, the limb generally irregular. Stamens generally four, didynamous, or of equal length, rarely two. Style one; stigma bifid or undivided; ovary two or four celled; fruit nucamentaceous or berried, composed of two or four nucules in a state of adhesion. Closely akin to Labiatæ, but the ovary is not four-lobed, nor is there the aromatic smell. The species are found chiefly in the tropics, and in South America beyond them. In hot countries they are generally shrubs or trees, in temperate climates they are mostly herbs. Known genera forty-five, species 663 (Lindley); genera forty, species 550 (Sir J. Hooker).

vēr'-bē-nāte, v. t. [Latin verbenatus=adorned with a garland of verbenæ (q. v.).] To strew or sanctify with sacred boughs according to an ancient custom.

1. Lit.: Green; covered with growing plants or grass; fresh, flourishing.

"The verdant grass."—Milton: P. L., vii. 310.

2. Fig. Green in knowledge; simple by inexperience; innocent; easily deceived or taken in; raw. (Colloq. or slang.)

vērd ān-tīque' (que as k), s. [Fr., from verdi=green, and antique=ancient, antique.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A term applied to a green incrustation on ancient brass or copper coins. [ÆRUGO.]

2. Petrol.: A name given to a variety of marble (carbonate of lime) of a clouded green color, owing to the presence of serpentine, which sometimes occurs in angular patches. Also applied to serpentine rocks of shades of green which are veined with greenish calcite or dolomite. Sometimes applied, though erroneously, to the green porphyry used by the Romans.

vēr'-dant-lŷ, adv. [Eng. verdant; -ly.]

1. Lit.: In a verdant, green, or flourishing manner.

2. Fig.: Like one green or inexperienced; innocently.

vēr'-dê, a. or s. [Fr.] Green.

verde di Corsica, s.

Petrol.: A name given to certain varieties of gabro (q. v.), occurring in the island of Corsica, which, from their hardness, permit of being used for ornamental work.

verde-eterno, subst. A neutral acetate of copper, prepared by dissolving verdigris in hot acetic acid, then leaving the filtered solution to cool, when beautiful dark-green crystals are deposited. These were much used by the early Venetian painters, as well for solid painting, as for glazings. (Fairholt.)

vēr'-dē-a, s. [Ital. = a peculiar sort of white grape, the wine made from it.] (See compound.)

verdea-wine, subst. A kind of Italian wine, so called from the grape of which it was made.

"Say it had been at Rome, and seen the relics, Drunk your verdea-wine, and rid at Naples."

Baum. & Flet.: Elder Brother, ii. 1.

ver-de-grese, verd-grese, s. [VERDIGRIS.]

vēr'-dēr-ēr, vēr'-dēr-ōr, s. [Fr. verdier, from Low Latin viridarius, from Lat. viridis (Fr. verd, vert)=green.] An officer of the royal forests, whose peculiar charge was to take care of the vert, that is, the trees and underwood of the forests, and to keep the assizes, view, receive, and enroll attachments and presentments of all manner of trespasses.

"A forest . . . hath also her peculiar officers, as foresters, verderers, regards, agisters, &c."—Howell: Letters, bk. iv., let. 16.

vēr'-dict, ver-dit, ver-dite, ver-dyt, subst. [Prop. verdit, from O. Fr. verdit (Fr. verdict); Low Lat. verdictum=a true saying, a verdict, from Lat. vere dictum=truly said; vere=truly, and dictum, neut. sing. of dictus, pa. par. of dico=to say.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Decision, judgment; opinion pronounced.

"According to the verdict of their own consciences."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 5.

2. Law: The answer of a jury to the court concerning any matter of fact in any cause, civil or criminal, committed to their trial and examination. In criminal cases the verdict in this country and in England is "guilty" or "not guilty;" in Scotland it may be "not proven." In civil cases it is a finding for the plaintiff or defendant, according to the facts. These are general verdicts; special verdicts are also sometimes found. [SPECIAL VERDICT, JURY.] A verdict may be set aside, and a new trial ordered, on the ground of its being against the weight of evidence. Verdicts must be found unanimously by the jury.

"Formerly, if the verdict were notoriously wrong, the jurors might have been punished, and the verdict set aside by writ of attainat at the suit of the Crown; but not at the suit of the prisoner. But the practice, which at one time prevailed, of fining, imprisoning, or otherwise punishing jurors, merely at the discretion of the court, for finding their verdict contrary to the direction of the judge, was arbitrary, unconstitutional, and illegal."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 27.

"The decision of a judge or referee upon an issue of fact is not called a verdict, but a finding, or a finding of fact."—Abbott.

vēr'-dī-grīs, vēr'-dē-grīs, verd-grese, ver-de-grese, ver-di-grease, s. [Old Fr. verderis; Fr. verd de gris=verdigrise, Spanish green (Cotgrave); from Low Lat. viride æris=green of brass; viride, neut. sing. of viridis=green, and æris (genit. of æs)=brass.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The green incrustation which is found on copper or brass when left in contact with fatty or other acids.

vermiform - appendage, vermiform - appendix, s.

Compar. Anatomy: Appendix cæci vermiformis. [APPENDIX, I. 1.] So far as is known, this appendage is peculiar to man, certain of the higher apes, and the wombat.

¶ The vermiform appendage in the human species hangs from the cæcum, which is the point of junction between the smaller intestines and the ascending colon. In size and shape it resembles a man's little finger. Its lining membrane secretes a mucus which in health constantly wells up into the lower end of the colon where the ileo-cæcal valve opens, and this mucus acts as a lubricant to the valve. Sometimes the appendix becomes ingested with fecal matter and serious and even fatal inflammation results. [APPENDICITIS.]

"The vermiform appendix is a little portion of the intestine resembling somewhat in size and shape the little finger. It is situated on the right side of the belly, above the groin. Its inflammation is called appendicitis. While with proper care this trouble usually heals by itself, there are cases where an abscess forms. Then arises the danger of this abscess bursting and pus and contents of the bowels escaping into the belly (abdominal cavity), thereby causing a general inflammation of the lining of the abdominal cavity—peritonitis. General peritonitis, as a rule, leads to death. The object of any operation in a case of appendicitis is to ward off general peritonitis. This is accomplished by emptying the abscess outwardly or by cutting away (tying off) the vermiform appendix before it bursts, or soon enough after rupture before general peritonitis has time to develop. In the first case the operation is simple enough, amounting to no more than incising the belly wall. In the second it is somewhat more complicated. The operation, however, is always efficacious, since the focus of disease and infection is thereby done away with at once. An operation is preëminently efficacious also in case of relapsing appendicitis, which means a case of repeated attacks of the disease. The removal of the appendix during an interval of the disease is sound logic in such a case, because such an appendix invariably contains particles of fecal matter or pus with the germs for new attacks of inflammation. . . . Those allowing themselves to suffer with chronic constipation should bear in mind that among their number we chiefly meet with appendicitis cases. They should never make light of a sudden onset of pain in the right side, but call in their medical adviser at once."—Dr. H. Banga in New York World.

vēr-nī-cōse, a. [Low Lat. vernix (genit. vernici)=varnish.]

vēr-nī-ēr, s. [Named after the inventor, Peter Vernier, of Brussels, who described it in a tract printed in 1631.] A contrivance for measuring fractional portions of one of the equal spaces into which a scale or limb, or a graduated instrument is divided.

The vernier consists of a graduated scale, so arranged as to cover an exact number of spaces on the primary scale, or limb, to which it is applied. The vernier is divided into a number of equal parts, greater or less by 1, than the number of spaces which it covers on the limb. That applied to the barometer will illustrate its principle, a representing the mercurial column, b the vernier, and c the barometer-scale, divided into inches and tenths. The vernier scale is $1\frac{1}{10}$ inches in length, and is divided into ten equal parts, each embracing $\frac{1}{10}$ of an inch, and therefore exceeding each division of the scale by $\frac{1}{100}$ of an inch. If, therefore, any division of the vernier coincide with a division on the scale, that division, counting downward, when the 0 of the vernier coincides with the top of the mercurial column, indicates the number of hundredths of an inch to be added to the tenths division on the scale next above which the 0 of the vernier stands.

vernier-compass, s. A surveyor's compass whose compass-circle is fitted with a vernier attachment.

vernier-transit, s. A transit having a vernier-attachment to the compass. [TRANSIT, s., II. 3.]

vēr-nīle, adj. [Latin vernilis, from verna=a slave.] Suited or characteristic of a slave; servile, slavish.

vēr-nīl'-i-tý, s. [Lat. vernilitas, from vernilis=vernile (q. v.).] Servility; fawning behavior, like that of a slave.

ver-nish, v. t. & i. [VARNISH.]

vēr-nō-nī-a, s. [Named after William Vernon, a botanical traveler in North America.]

Bot.: A large genus of Heterocomæ, the typical one of Vernoniaceæ. Style cylindrical, with tapering branches, everywhere covered with bristles. More than 400 species are known, chiefly from the hotter parts of the western hemisphere. The seeds of Vernonia anthelmintica (=Serratula anthelmintica of Roxburgh), a plant found in the Himalayas and some other parts of India, yield an oil. The seeds themselves are a valuable tonic and stomachic, and are said to be diuretic. They are used as an anthelmintic, and bruised and mixed with lime-juice to destroy pediculi. The Hindus consider them of great use in white leprosy and other skin diseases. A decoction of V. cinerea, another Indian species, is used in India to promote perspiration.

vēr-nō-nī-ā-çé-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vermoni(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Tubulifloræ. Style cylindrical, its arms generally long and subulate, occasionally short and blunt, wholly covered with bristles. Subtribes: Ethuliæ, Heterocomæ, Elephantopæ, Rolandæ, Bojeriæ, Liabæ, and Pectidæ.

Vē-rō-nā, s. [See def.] A city and province in the north of Italy.

Verona-serge, subst. A thin fabric of various colors made of worsted and cotton, and sometimes of mohair and cotton.

Vēr-ō-nēse, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Verona.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Verona; as a plural, the inhabitants of Verona collectively.

Vē-rōn'-i-ca, Ver-one-i-ke, s. [See def. 1.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The traditional name of the woman who was cured of an issue of blood (Mark v. 25-34), originally given as Bernice, or Berenice. The name Veronica soon came to be popularly explained as equivalent to the words vera icon=true likeness, and hence arose the legend that St. Veronica was a holy woman who wiped the perspiration from the face of the Savior, when toiling to Calvary, upon the sudarium which she carried, and which immediately received an impression of his features. A relic, purporting to be this very napkin, is still preserved in St. Peter's at Rome. Copies of the portrait were called Veroniceæ, or Veroniculæ, whence the English vernicle (q. v.).

2. A copy of the portrait or impression of Our Lord's features imprinted on the sudarium of St. Veronica; a vernicle.

II. Bot.: Speedwell; the typical genus of Veroniceæ. Herbs or shrubs, generally with opposite, sometimes with whorled, leaves; calyx four to five partite; corolla rotate, four cleft, the lowest segment the narrowest; stamens two; capsule two-celled. Known species about 160, from the north temperate zone and from Australia and New Zealand. All have a certain delicate beauty. One of the finest is Veronica chamædrys, frequent in May and June in woods, pastures, and on hedge-banks. Its stem has the soft hairs disposed on two opposite lines, changing their position above each joint; the leaves are wrinkled, the corolla very bright blue. V. officinalis, a pubescent plant, with a procumbent stem, ovate-serrate leaves, and spicate racemes, is abundant in woods and pastures; its bitter and astringent leaves infused make a kind of tea, which has been used medicinally. Other somewhat common species are V. arvensis, V. agrestis, V. serpyllifolia, V. montana, and V. hederæfolia.

vēr-ō-nīç'-ē-æ, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. veronic(a) Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Rhinanthideæ. Inflorescence centripetal; leaves opposite; corolla almost regular; stamens two, diverging. (Sir J. Hooker.)

(2) Power or liberty to cut green trees or wood.

2. Her.: A green color; in coats of nobility it is called Emerald, and in those of princes Venus. It is expressed in engraving by diagonal lines, drawn from dexter chief to the sinister base.

"Between three plates, a chevron engrailed chequy, or, vert, and ermins."—Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humor, iii. 1.

vért, v. i. [VERT (1), s.] To change one's religion; spec., to leave the Church of England for the Roman Communion, or vice versa.

vēr'-tant, a. [Fr.]

Her.: The same as FLECTED and REFLECTED—i. e., formed like the letter S reverted.

vēr'-tē-brā (plural vēr'-tē-bræ), vēr'-tē-bre (bre as bēr), s. [Lat. = a joint, a vertebra, from verto = to turn; Fr. vertèbre; Sp., Port. & Ital. vertebra.]

Compar. Anat.: One of the bony segments of which the spine, or backbone, consists. Theoretically, a typical vertebra consists of a central piece or body, from which two arches are given off, one (the neural), protecting the nervous system, the other (the hæmal) protecting the organs of circulation, and thus corresponding to the doubly tubular structure of the body of the Vertebrata. (See illustration under VERTEBRATA.) In practice the second arch is only recognizable with difficulty, the parts being either absent or much modified, but a good example may be seen in the human thorax. The fundamental element of each vertebra is the body or centrum (c), from the surface of which spring two bony arches (n n), called the neural arches, or neurapophyses, because they form with the body the neural canal, which incloses the spinal cord. From the point of junction there is usually developed a spine, called the spinous process, or neural spine (s), rudimentary in the atlas or first cervical vertebra. From the neural arches are also developed the articular process or zygapophyses (a a), which aid the centra in uniting the vertebræ to each other. From the sides of the body proceed the transverse processes (d d). The number of vertebræ varies greatly in different animals. The vertebral column is divisible into distinct regions, of which the following are recognizable in the higher Vertebrata: The cervical vertebræ (seven in man), composing the neck (1); the dorsal (twelve in man), usually carrying well-developed ribs (2); the lumbar (five in man) (3). These form the cervical, dorsal, and lumbar regions respectively, and are sometimes called True Vertebræ, to distinguish them from the False Vertebræ, which consist of those in the sacral region usually ankylosed to form a single bone, the os sacrum (4), and a variable number of vertebræ forming the caudal region or tail (5). The spaces between the vertebræ are filled with an elastic substance, admitting of an amount of motion which, though slight between each pair, is in the aggregate sufficient to give the spinal column considerable flexibility. The vertebræ and their projections or processes afford attachments for a number of muscles and ligaments, and passages for blood-vessels and for the nerves passing out of the spinal cord.

vēr'-tē-brā, a. & s. [Eng. vertebr(a); -al.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to the vertebræ or joints of the spine.

"The carotid, vertebral and splenic arteries."—Ray: On the Creation.

2. Having a backbone or spinal joints; vertebrate.

*B. As subst.: An animal belonging to the division Vertebrata (q. v.); a vertebrate.

vertebral-column, s.

Comp. Anat.: The spine. [VERTEBRA.]

vēr'-tē-brā'-tā, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Latin vertebratus = jointed, vertebrated.]

Zoöl.: A division of the Animal Kingdom, instituted by Lamarck, comprising animals in which the body is composed of a number of definite segments [VERTEBRA], arranged along a longitudinal axis; the nervous system is in its main masses dorsal, and the neural and hæmal regions of the body are always completely separated by a partition; the limbs are never more than four in number; generally there is a bony axis known as the spine or vertebral column, and a notochord is always present in the embryo, though it may not persist in adult life. A specialized hæmal system is present in all, and in all but Amphioxus there is a heart with never less than two chambers, and in the higher vertebrates with four. The Vertebrata are usually divided into five classes: Pisces, Amphibia, Reptilia, Aves, and Mammalia, and many attempts have been made to gather these classes into groups. One plan is to divide them into Branchiata (Fishes and Amphibians), because at some portion of their life they are provided with gills, and Abranchiata (Reptiles, Birds, and Mammals), having no gills. The latter are sometimes called Amniota or Allantoidea, because the embryo is provided with an amnion and an allantois, while both these are absent in the Branchiata, which are therefore called Anamniota or Anallantoidea. Owen made two sections: Hæmatocrya, or Cold-blooded Vertebrates (Fishes, Amphibia, and Reptiles), and Hæmatotherma, or Warm-blooded Vertebrates (Birds and Mammals); and Huxley three: Ichthyopsida (Fishes and Amphibia), Sauropsida (Reptiles and Birds), and Mammalia. A later classification is to treat all the Vertebrata as a division of a larger group, Chordata, distinguished by (1) the temporary or permanent possession of a rod (the notochord) underlying the central dorsally-placed nervous system; and (2) the temporary or permanent presence of visceral clefts (q. v.). The Chordata are divided into three groups: (1) Cephalochordata, in which the notochord, pointed at the extremities, extends from one end of the body to the other; (2) Urochordata (q. v.), and (3) the true Vertebrata, or Craniata, in which the anterior end of the central nervous system is enlarged into a brain, which becomes surrounded and protected by a cartilaginous capsule or skull.

vēr'-tē-brāte, a. & s. [VERTEBRATA.]

A. As adjective:

1. Zoöl.: Belonging to the sub-kingdom Vertebrata (q. v.).

2. Bot. (of a leaf): Contracted at intervals with an articulation at each contraction.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the sub-kingdom Vertebrata (q. v.).

vēr'-tē-brāt-ēd, a. [English vertebrat(e); -ed.] The same as VERTEBRATE (q. v.).

vēr'-tē-bre (bre as bēr), s. [VERTEBRA.]

vēr'-tēx (pl. vēr'-tē-çēs (Latin), vēr'-tēx-ēs (Eng.), s. [Lat. = the top, prop. = the turning-point, and especially the pole of the sky, the zenith; from verto = to turn. Vertex and vortex are doublets.]

*I. Ord. Lang.: A turning-point; the principal or highest point; the top, the summit, the apex. Applied specifically to—

(1) The zenith or point of the heavens directly overhead.

"These keep the vertex; but betwixt the bear And shining zodiack, where the planets err, A thousand figured constellations roll."—Creech: Lucretius.

(2) The top or crown of the head.

(3) The summit or top of a hill, or the like.

"Mountains especially abound with different species of vegetables; every vertex or eminence affording new kinds."—Derham: Physico-Theology.

II. Math.: The point in any figure opposite to and most distant from its base.

¶ (1) Vertex of a curve: The point from which the diameter is drawn or the intersection of the diameter and the curve. In the parabola, the principal vertex is the vertex of the axis of the curve; in the ellipse, the left-hand, and in the hyperbola the right-hand, vertex of the transverse axis.

(2) Vertex of an angle: The point at which the two lines meet to form the angle.

vēr'-tī-cal, vēr'-tī-call, a. & s. [Fr. vertical; from Lat. verticalis, from vertex (genit. verticis) = a vertex.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Pertaining or relating to the vertex; situated at the vertex, apex, or highest point; placed in the zenith or point in the heavens directly overhead.

"'T is raging noon; and, vertical, the sun Darts on the head direct his forceful rays."—Thomson: Summer, 432.

(2) Being in a position perpendicular to the plane of the horizon; placed or acting perpendicularly, or in an upright position or directly upright; plumb.

"The compound motion of the lower jaw, half lateral, and half vertical."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. ix.

*2. Fig.: At the highest point or zenith; occupying the highest place.

"He was vertical in the esteem of the soldiery."—Fuller: Worthies; Herefordshire.

II. Bot.: Placed in a direction from the base to the apex. All disseminations are vertical.

B. As subst.: A vertical circle, plane, or line.

"The direction of a vertical is normal to the surface of a free fluid."—Davies & Peck: Math. Dict.

¶ Prime-vertical:

Astron.: That vertical circle which is at right angles to the plane of the meridian, and which passes through the zenith and the east and west points of the horizon.

vertical-angles, s. pl.

Geom.: Opposite angles (q. v.).

vertical-anthers, s. pl.

Bot.: Anthers which are at the upper extremities of the filaments, and being inserted by their base point upward.

vertical-circle, s.

Astron.: A great circle passing through the zenith and the nadir. The meridian of any place is a vertical-circle.

vertical-dial, s. [DIAL, s., I. 3.]

vertical-escapement, s.

Horol.: An old form of escapement in watches, in which the axis of the scape-wheel is at right-angles to that of the verge, thus making its plane of revolution vertical, the plane of oscillation of the balance being assumed to be horizontal.

vertical-fins, s. pl.

Ichthy.: Fins situated in the median dorsal line from the head to the tail, and in the ventral line of the tail. Sometimes the vertical fins are continuous, or nearly so, but usually three vertical fins are distinguished—one in the dorsal line (the dorsal fin), one in the ventral line behind the anus (the anal fin), and one confined to the extremity of the tail (the caudal fin), called also Unpaired fins.

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del vertical-leaves, s. pl.

Bot.: Leaves which present one of their edges directly upward, so that neither side can be called upper or lower.

vertical-line, s.

Surv.: A perpendicular line; a line perpendicular to the plane of the horizon. [VERTICAL, B.]

vertical-plane, s.

1. [PLANE, ¶ 6.]
2. Conic sections: A plane passing through the vertex of a cone and through its axis.

vertical steam-engine, s. A form of steam-engine in which the piston reciprocates vertically, as distinguished from the horizontal, inclined, or rotary. [STEAM-ENGINE.]

vertical-strata, s. pl.

Geol.: Strata dipping at an angle of 90°. They constitute one side of a large basin or trough. Example, the strata at Alum Bay in the Isle of Wight.

vēr-tī-cāl'-i-tŷ, s. [Eng. vertical; -ity.] The quality or state of being vertical or in the zenith.

"Unto them the sun is vertical twice a year; making two distinct summers in the different points of the verticality."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi., ch. xi.

vēr-tī-cāl-lŷ, adv. [English vertical; -ly.] In a vertical manner, position, or direction in the zenith; perpendicularly.

"[The sun] . . . vertically passeth over the habitations of Peru and Brazilia."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi., ch. x.

vertically-compressed, s.

Bot.: The same as DEPRESSED.

vēr-tī-cāl-nēss, s. [Eng. vertical; -ness.] The quality or state of being vertical.

vēr-tī-čil, vēr-tī-čil, s. [VERTICILLUS.]

Botany: A term applied (1) to leaves when they stand around the stem in a circle, or when more than two of them are opposite; (2) to flowers when two verticillasters are united; (3) more rarely to branches when several spring from the stem at the same height. The use of the word was introduced by Linnaeus. Link used the expression Spurious Verticil or False Whorl.

vēr-tī-čil-lār'-i-a, s. [Formed from Mod. Lat. verticillus (q. v.).]

Bot.: A genus of Clusiaceae, containing one species, Verticillaria acuminata, a Peruvian tree with acuminate leaves, two colored sepals, and many stamens, and a three-valved capsular fruit.

vēr-tī-čil-lās'-tēr, s. [Mod. Latin verticillus, and Lat. aster=a star.]

Bot.: Hoffmannsegg's name for a cyme reduced to a very few flowers. This is the normal inflorescence in the Lamiaceae, in the species of which two verticillasters are situated opposite to each other in the axils of opposite leaves.

vēr-ŷi-čil-lā'-tæ, s. pl. [Fem. pl. of Mod. Lat. verticillatus=verticillate.]

Bot.: The fifty-eighth order of plants in Linnaeus' Natural System. It corresponded to the modern Labiate.

vēr-tī-čil-lāte, vēr-tī-čil-lāt-ēd, a. [VERTICILLATE.]

1. Bot.: Whorled (q. v.). Having leaves, flowers, or more rarely branches, arranged in verticils or whorls.

2. Zoöl.: Arranged like the spokes of a wheel.

vēr-tī-čil-lūs, s. [Lat.=a spindle whorl; dimin. from vertex (genit. verticis)=a vertex (q. v.).]

Bot.: The same as VERTICIL (q. v.).

vēr-tī-čil-i-tŷ, s. [Fr. verticité, from Lat. vertex (genit. verticis)=a vertex (q. v.).] The property or power of turning; rotation, revolution.

"It will appear endowed with a stronger and more durable verticity."—Boyle: Works, iii. 313.

vēr-tī-cle, s. [Latin verticulum, dimin. from vertex (genit. verticis)=a vertex (q. v.).] An axis, a hinge, a turning-point.

"The verticle is near, when admiration from abroad, and luxury at home, threaten our change."—Waterhouse: Apology for Learning, p. 51.

vēr-tī-dīne, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Chem.: An organic base, said to exist in the tar of bituminous shale. It has not yet been isolated.

vēr-tīg'-in-ōūs, adj. [Lat. vertiginosus, from vertigo (genit. vertiginis)=vertigo (q. v.); Fr. vertigineux; Sp., Port. & Ital. vertiginoso.]

1. Turning round; revolving, rotary.

"This vertiginous motion gives day and night successively over the whole earth, and makes it habitable all around."—Bentley.

2. Of the nature of vertigo; affected with vertigo; dizzy, giddy.

"I was sicke before of a vertiginous giddiness and irresolution."—Donne: Devotions, p. 193.

3. Causing vertigo; apt to affect one with giddiness.

"The smells of meat and vertiginous drinkings."—Bp. Taylor: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 15.

4. Apt to turn or change; unstable, fickle, inconstant.

"Depending upon . . . the winds and the tides of this vertiginous world."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 5.

vēr-tīg'-in-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. vertiginous; -ly.] In a vertiginous manner; with a whirling or giddiness.

"Go to! The smoothest, safest of you all . . . Will rock vertiginously in turn and reel."

Browning: Ring and Book, xi. 2,365.

vēr-tīg'-in-ōūs-nēss, subst. [Eng. vertiginous; -ness.] The quality or state of being vertiginous; a whirling, or sensation of whirling; giddiness; dizziness.

"The vertiginousness of our own brains."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 9.

vēr-tī-gō, vēr-tī-gō, s. [Lat., from verto=to turn.]

Pathol.: Giddiness; a feeling as if external objects whirled round, or as one had been whirling round, or were about to fall, which one tends to do unless he grasp something fixed, or sit down. Sometimes there is staggering without any considerable sense of giddiness, and at others the exact reverse. The malady is most common in advanced life, and is sometimes the precursor of apoplexy or paralysis. The staggering of a drunken man is a form of vertigo produced by alcoholic poisoning; that of a patient on first attempting to rise after a long illness is caused by weakness. It is a common symptom of excessive or defective supply of blood to the brain, and also of derangement of the digestive organs. Except when there is obvious plethora of the system, tonic medicines are required.

vēr-tī-līn'-ē-ar, adj. [English verti(cal), and linear.] Straight, rectangular.

vēr-tū, vēr-tū, vēr-tū, vēr-tū, subst. [Ital. virtù, vertù, for virtute=virtue, excellence, especially in a love of the fine arts, from Lat. virtutem, accus. of virtus=virtue (q. v.).] Artistic excellence, that quality which commends articles to the collectors of works of arts; hence, works of art, antiquity, or curiosity collectively, especially such as are preserved in museums, private collections, or the like.

"I had thoughts in my chamber to place it in view, To be shown to my friends as a piece of virtu."

Goldsmith: The Haunch of Venison.

vēr-tue, s. [VIRTUE.]

vēr-tu-gal, subst. [See def.] A doubtful word, probably the same as FARTHINGALE (q. v.), or Vardingale, as the author (see extract) is speaking of Sardanapalus, who was extremely effeminate and wore women's clothes.

"Amid his vertugals for ayde he drew From his Lieutenant, who did him pursew."

Hudson: Judith, v. 215.

vēr-tu-les, a. [VIRTUELESS.]

vēr-tūm-nal, a. [From Latin Vertumnus=an Etruscan deity, the god of the changing year, from verto=to change.] A term of doubtful meaning. Davies (Supp. Gloss.) thinks Adams, having the first syllable (Lat. ver=spring) chiefly in his mind, uses the word as=spring.

"Her smiles are more reviving than the vertumnal sunshine."—Adams: Works, ii. 333.

vēr-tu-ōūs, a. [VIRTUOUS.]vēr-u-coūs, a. [VERRUCOSE.]

Vēr-u-lā'-mī-an, adj. [Latin Verulamium, the ancient name of St. Albans.] Of or pertaining to St. Albans, or to Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam.

"A temper well fitted for the reception of the Verulamian doctrine."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

vēr-vāin, *var-vin, *ver-vaine, *ver-vine, ver-veyne, s. [Fr. verveine, from Latin verbena.] [VERBENA.]

Bot.: The genus Verbena (q. v.), specially V. officinalis.

"She nightshade strows to work him ill, Therewith the vervain, and the dill, That hindreth witches of their will."

Drayton: Nymphidia.

vervain-mallow, s.

Bot.: Malva alcea, a native of Germany.

vērve, s. [Fr.] Spirit; enthusiasm.

"Act with genuine verve and impulse."—London Daily Telegraph.

vēr-vēl, *vēr-vail, subst. [Fr. vervelle.] A label tied to a hawk, and containing the owner's name, &c.

"Free beauteous slave, thy happy feet In silver fetters vervails meet."

Lovelace: Lucasta Posthuma; The Falcon.

vēr'-vēt, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Zoölogy: Cercopithecus pygerythrus, a small monkey, from Senegal and surrounding districts. Prevailing tint greenish; head, throat, and breast light dun, paws dark.

vēr'-ŷ, *ver-al, *ver-ra, *ver-ray, *ver-rei, *ver-rey, *verye, a. & adv. [O. F. verai, vray (Fr. vrai), from a supposed Low Lat. veracus, from Lat. verax, genit. veracis=veracious (q. v.); cf. O. Surg., &c.: Of or belonging to the vagina and to the bladder; as, vesico-vaginal hernia.

vē-sic'-u-lā (pl. vē-sic'-u-læ), s. [Latin = a little vesicle, a blister.]

Pathol. (pl.): An order of cutaneous diseases, characterized by the occurrence of vesicles. These may be globular, umbilicated, or acuminated. They arise on any part of the body, and resemble drops of water on the spots where they exist. The fluid in them may be absorbed, or it becomes effused, causing excoriation and small thin incrustations. The order contains three diseases: Sudamina, Herpes, and Eczema.

vēs'-ī-cū-læ-form, a. [Lat. vesiculæ, genit. of vesicula, and forma = form.] Having the form of a vesicle or vesicles.

vē-sic'-u-lar, a. [Fr. vésiculaire, from Latin vesicula = a vesicle (q. v.).] Pertaining to or consisting of vesicles; like a vesicle; bladdery, cellulose; full of interstices.

"Special accumulations of vesicular matter."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., i. 349.

vesicular-emphysema, s.

Pathol.: The enlargement of the air-cells of the lungs, followed by the perforation of their walls, so as to produce small oval openings, ultimately enlarging. Called also Pulmonary Emphysema.

vē-sic'-u-late, adj. [Latin vesicula = a vesicle; Eng. adj. suff. -ate.] Full of vesicles or small bladders; vesicular.

vē-sic'-u-lif-ēr-ī, subst. pl. [Lat. vesicula = a vesicle, and fero = to bear. Named from the small globose, transparent sac in which the spores are first enclosed.]

Bot.: The same as PHYSOMYCETES (q. v.).

vē-sic'-u-lō'-sa, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. vesiculosus.] [VESICULOSE.]

Entom.: A tribe of Diptera created by Latreille. It was equivalent to Leach's family Acroceridae. There are two genera, Acrocera (=Syrphus, in part) and Henops (=Ogcodes), both composed of small insects, having the abdomen much swollen. Species few in number, chiefly exotic; found upon plants and among flowers.

vē-sic'-u-lōse, vē-sic'-u-lōus, adj. [Lat. vesiculosus, from vesicula = a vesicle (q. v.); Fr. vésiculeux.] Pertaining to or of the nature of vesicles; vesicular.

ves'-pā, s. [Lat. = a wasp.]

Entom.: Wasp: the type-genus of the family Vespidae (q. v.), with numerous species, universally distributed. Abdomen broad; mandibles broad, oblique at tip and toothed; clypeus quadrate, truncate in front.

vēs'-pēr, s. & a. [Lat. = the evening, the evening star; vespera = even-tide; cogn. with Gr. hesperos = evening (adj. & subst.); O. Fr. vespre (Fr. vêpre); vespres = even-song.]

A. As substantive:

1. The evening star; a name applied to the planet Venus when she is to the east of the sun and appears after sunset.

"Vesper fair Cynthia ushers, and her train."

P. Fletcher: Purple Island, v.

2. Hence, fig., evening.

"Thou hast seen these signs:

They are black vesper's pageants."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 12.

3. Ecclesiology (pl.):

(1) The time of evening service.

(2) The sixth hour of the Roman Breviary. When said or sung in public, vespers form the usual evening service of the Roman Church, approximately corresponding to the Evening Prayer of the Anglican.

B. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to the evening or to the service of vespers; as, a vesper-bell, a vesper-hymn, &c.

¶ Sicilian Vespers: [SICILIAN-VESPERS.]

vēs'-pēr-āl, adj. [Eng. vesper; -al.] Vesper, evening.

vēs'-pēr-tīl'-ī-ō, s. [Lat. = a bat, from vesper = evening.]

1. Zool.: The type-genus of Vespertiliones (q. v.), with forty-three species, ranging over the temperate and tropical regions of both hemispheres. Muzzle long; glandular prominences between the eyes small; nostrils opening by simple crescentic apertures; crown of the head vaulted; ears separate, oval, generally equaling and often exceeding the length of the head; tragus long, generally acute, and attenuated upward; tail less than length of head and body; face hairy. Most of the species appear to live in woods; some, either habitually or occasionally, live in caves or under the roofs of houses. The position of attachment of the wings to the hinder extremities and the size of the foot appear to be connected with the nature of their dwellings; those which live in caves have larger feet, more or less free from the wing-membrane, while those living in woods have much smaller feet, enclosed in the wing-membrane to the base of the toes.

2. Palæont.: Vespertilio parisiensis appears in the Upper Eocene of Montmartre.

vēs'-pēr-tīl'-ī-ō-nēs, s. pl. [Pl. of Mod. Lat. vespertilio (q. v.).]

Zool.: A group of Vespertilionidae, with eight genera, having the range of the family. Nostrils simple, opening by crescentic or circular apertures at the extremity of the muzzle; ears generally moderate; forehead not grooved.

vēs'-pēr-tīl'-ī-ō-nī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vespertilio, genit. vespertilionis; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ideæ.]

1. Zool.: A family of Microchiroptera, with three groups (Plecoti, Vespertiliones, and Minioptera), generally distributed throughout the temperate and tropical regions of both hemispheres. They are easily distinguished from all other bats by their simple nostrils at the extremity of the conical, somewhat elongated muzzle, by the long tail produced to the hinder margin of the large interfemoral membrane, and by the upper incisor teeth, which are separated by a wide space, and placed near the canines. The eyes are minute, and the inner margins of the ears arise from the sides of the head, not from the forehead. (Dobson.)

2. Palæont.: From the Eocene Tertiary.

vēs'-pēr-tīl'-ī-ō-nī-ne, a. [Mod. Lat. vespertilio (q. v.), genit. vespertilionis; Eng. adj. suff. -ine.] Of, belonging to, or resembling the genus Vespertilio or the family Vespertilionidae (q. v.).

vespertilionine-alliance, s.

Zool.: The name given by Dobson to a division of his Microchiroptera. It consists of three families: Rhinolophidae, Nycteridae, and Vespertilionidae.

vēs'-pēr-tīne, a. [Lat. vespertinus, from vesper = evening.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Pertaining to the evening; happening or being in the evening.

"The stars, their matutine and vespertine motions, rise and fall."—Sir T. Herbert: Travels.

2. Late; hence, full, complete.

"That vespertine knowledge of the saints."—Bp. Hall: The Best Bargain.

II. Geology: The term applied to the thirteenth series of the Appalachian strata, equivalent to the lowest Carboniferous group of Europe. The maximum thickness in Pennsylvania exceeds 2,000 feet. (Prof. H. D. Rogers: Geology of Pennsylvania.)

vēs'-pēr-ū-gō, s. [Lat. = a bat, from vesperus = evening.]

Zool.: A genus of Vespertiliones, with twenty-two species, universally distributed, but more common in the temperate and subtropical regions of the eastern hemisphere. This genus has also the most northerly range of the Chiroptera, one species—Vesperugo borealis—having been found close to the limits of the Arctic Circle. The Bats of this genus are the Common Bats of all countries, and may be easily known by their comparatively thick bodies, flat, broad heads, and obtuse muzzles (the thickness of which is increased in front by the rounded glandular elevations), short, broad, and triangular obtusely-pointed ears, obtuse and slightly incurved tragus, short legs, and by the presence in most species of a well-developed post-calcaneal lobule, which probably acts as a kind of adhesive disc in securing the animal's grasp when climbing over smooth surfaces.

vēs'-pī-a-rŷ, s. [Lat. vespa = a wasp.] A nest or habitation of wasps, hornets, &c.; a colony or community of such insects.

vēs'-pī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vesp(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ideæ.]

Entom.: A family of Diptera (having the anterior wings longitudinally duplicate), with thirteen genera and about 1,000 species, universally distributed. Head-shield nearly square; mandibles short, toothed at tips; antennæ twelve-jointed in females and neuters, an extra joint in those of the males.

vēs'-pīl-lō, s. [Lat., from vesper = evening.]

Rom. Antiq.: One who carried out the dead in the evening for burial.

"By raking into the bowels of the deceased, continual sight of anatomies, skeletons, or cadaverous reliques, like vespilloes, or grave diggers, I am (not) become stupid, nor have I forgot the apprehension of mortality."—Brownie: Religio Medici, pt. i., § 38.

vēs'-sēl, ves-sell, ves-selle, s. [O. French vaissel, veissel, vessel (Fr. vaisseau), from Lat. vascellum = a small urn or vase; dimin. from vas = a vase (q. v.); Sp. vasillo; Ital. vascillo, vasello.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A utensil for holding liquids and other things, as a jug, a cup, a dish, a cask, a barrel, &c.

"The wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps."—Matt. xxv. 4.

(2) A ship or craft of any kind, but more particularly one larger than a mere boat.

"Like a weather-beaten vessel holds Gladly the port, though shroud and tackle torn."

Milton: P. L., ii. 1,043.

2. Fig.: Anything conceived as formed for or capable of receiving and containing; hence, in Scriptural language, a person into whom anything is conceived as being poured or infused, or to whom something has been imparted; a receptacle; a recipient.

"Vessels of mercy . . . prepared unto glory."—Rom. ix. 22, 23.

II. Technically (pl.):

1. Anat.: Any tube or canal in which the fluids of the body are contained, secreted, or circulated. Used of the arteries, the veins, and of the lymphatics.

2. Bot.: (sometimes used in the Latin form vasa): Tubes occurring in the interior of plants, and serving for the conveyance of sap and air. They are of various kinds, as annular, barred and imperfectly barred dotted, milk, punctated, reticulated, scalariform, spiral, tracheary, and transitory vessels.

¶ The weaker vessel: A term frequently applied to a woman, in allusion to 1 Peter iii. 7.

"I must comfort the weaker vessel, as doublet and hose ought to show itself courageous to petticoat."—Shakesp. As You Like It, ii. 4.

vēs'-sēl, v. t. [VESSEL, subst.] To place or put into a vessel.

"Take earth, and vessel it, and in that set the seed."—Bacon.

ves-sell, ves-selle, s. [VESSEL, s.]

vēs'-sētŝ, vēs'-sēs, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Fabric: A sort of worsted. (Prov.)

vēs'-sīg-nōn, s. [Fr. veffignon, from Lat. vesica = a blister, a bladder.] A kind of soft swelling on a horse's leg; a windgall.

vēst, s. [Lat. vestis = a garment, a dress; vestio = to clothe. From the same root as Sans. vas = to put on (clothes); Gr. enymī = to dress, to clothe; esthēs = clothing; Goth. gawasjan = to clothe; wasti = clothes; Fr. veste.]

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, çhis; sin, aŝ; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; çion, -çion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

1. Literally:

* (1) An article of dress covering the person; an outer garment; a vesture, a dress, a gown.

"The vests that holy rites require."

Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, iii. 193.

(2) A short, sleeveless garment, worn by men under the coat, and covering the upper part of the body; a waistcoat (q. v.). (A tailor's word.)

¶ Pull down your vest: An American slang expression, intended to interrupt and confuse a speaker. It is tantamount to the otherslang expressions "Shut up," "Come off," &c.

*2. Fig.: Dress, array, garments.

vest, v. t. & i. [VEST, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To clothe with or as with a garment, vesture, or dress; to dress, to robe.

"Concerning the vesting of the priests in the Levitical ministrations."—Bp. Taylor: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 10.

2. Hence, to cover, surround, or envelop closely.

"The verdant fields with those of heaven may vie,
With ether vested and a purple sky."

Dryden. (Todd.)

3. To invest or clothe, as with authority; to put in possession; to endow with; to confer upon; to put more or less formally in possession. (Followed by with.)

"This company, in consideration of a sum paid to the king, is vested with the property of all diamonds found in Brazil."—Anson: Voyages, bk. i., ch. v.

4. To place or put in the possession or at the disposal of; to give or confer an immediate fixed right of present or future possession of or authority over. (Followed by in.)

"Truelie vested in his possession by the forfeiture which Duncan, sometime county of Fife, had doone in K. Robert Bruses daies."—Holinshed: History of Scotland (an. 1357).

*5. To lay out, as money on capital; to invest.

B. Intrans.: To come or descend; to be fixed to take effect, as a title or right; to devolve (followed by in); as, upon the death of the ancestor the estate, or right to the estate, vests in the heir.

Vēs'-tā, s. [Lat.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 2.

2. Fig.: A wax match, which ignites by friction.

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 4.]

2. Rom. Mythol.: One of the great divinities of the ancient Romans, identified with the Greek Hestia, the virgin goddess of the hearth. She was worshiped, together with the Penates, at every meal, when the family assembled round the hearth, which was in the middle of the room. The sacred fire, said to have been brought by Æneas from Troy, burned perpetually on her altar, and was tended by the Vestal Virgins. The fire was never willingly permitted to expire; but if such an accident occurred through neglect, it was considered an omen of the worst description, and required the most careful and solemn expiations. In the Augustan age Vesta was represented as a personification of Terra, or the Earth, and at a later period she was confounded with Ops, Rhea, Cybele, Bona Dea, and Maia. Her festivals, called Vestalia, were celebrated June 8th.

vēs'-tāl, vēs'-tāl, a. & s. [Lat. Vestalis, from Vesta (q. v.).]

A. As adjective:

1. Lit.: Pertaining or relating to the goddess Vesta; sacred to Vesta.

"Those institutions which . . . have still kept the light burning like the vestal fire."—Knox: Essays, No. 112.

II. Figuratively:

1. Pure, innocent, chaste; such as would become a Vestal Virgin.

"In pure and vestal modesty."

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 3.

2. Pertaining to or characteristic of a nun.

"My vestal habit me contenting more, Than all the robes adorning me before."

Drayton: Matilda to King John.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: One of the Vestal Virgins (q. v.).

2. Fig.: A virgin; a woman of spotless chastity; a chaste woman in general. Sometimes applied to a woman who devotes herself to religion; a religious, a nun.

"How happy is the blameless vestal's lot,
The world forgetting, by the world forgot."

Pope: Eloisa to Abelard, 207.

¶ Entomology: Sterrha sacra; a European Geometer Moth, having the fore wings pale yellow with a pink stripe. The caterpillar feeds on various species of Rumex, on the camomile, &c.

Vestal Virgins, s. pl.

Roman Mythol.: The name given to the virgin priestesses who had charge of the temple of the goddess Vesta, at Rome, and the superintendence of the sacred fire which blazed perpetually on her altar. Their number was originally four, but was afterward increased to six; and the period of their service extended to thirty years. The first ten years were spent in acquiring a knowledge of their duties, the second in discharging them, and the third in instructing the novices. During the whole of this time they were bound to continue in a state of maidenhood; but, at the expiration of the period, they were free to return to the world, and even to marry if they thought fit. When a vacancy occurred in their number, it was filled by the Pontifex Maximus, to whose control they were subject. If, however, through carelessness, they allowed the sacred fire to be extinguished, they were chastised with rods by the Pontifex Maximus, and, if any of them violated their vows of chastity, they were condemned to be buried alive in the Campus Sceleratus. The abolition of the Vestal Virgins was effected in the reign of Theodosius.

"The institution of the vestal virgins is generally attributed to Numa; though we meet with the sacred fire long before, and even in the time of Æneas."—Kennett: Antiquities of Rome, pt. ii., bk. ii., ch. vi.

věst'-ān, subst. [After Vesta, the goddess of the domestic hearth.]

Min.: A name given by Jenzsch to a variety of quartz supposed to crystallize in the triclinic system. Found in the Melaphyres of Saxony and the Thuringian forest.

vēs-tīb'-ū-lar, a. [Eng. vestibul(e); -ar.] Pertaining to or resembling a vestibule.

vēs-tī-būle, s. [Lat. vestibulum, prob. from a root ve=away, apart, and stabulum=an abode; Fr. vestibule.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A passage, hall, or ante-chamber next the outer door of a house, and from which doors open into the various inner rooms of a house; a porch, a lobby, a hall.

II. Anatomy:

1. A chamber; as the vestibule of the ear, which is the central chamber of the labyrinth; as the vestibule of the aorta, which is a small compartment constituting the part of the ventricle which adjoins the aorta.

2. An angular interval; as, the vestibule of the vulva, which is an angular interval between the nymphæ.

vestibuled-train, s. A railway passenger train having the platforms between the adjacent cars inclosed, so as to form an antechamber or vestibule.

vēs-tīb'-ū-lūm, s. [Lat.]

Anat.: The same as VESTIBULE (q. v.).

vēs'-tī-gāte, v. t. [Latin vestigatus, pa. par. of vestigo=to search out.] To investigate.

vēs'-tīge, ves-tī-gie, s. [Fr., from Lat. vestigium=a footstep, a track.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The mark of a foot made in passing; a footstep, a footprint, a track, a trace; hence, a mark, sign, trace, or impression of something no longer present or existing; a sensible evidence or sign of something absent, lost, or gone; remains.

"And countless generations of mankind Depart and leave no vestige where they trod."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

II. Biol.: (See extract.)

"Anatomists who are careful in the use of terms, and yet have had to content themselves with using one and the same word, rudiment, for disappearing and for imperfect structures, will welcome a suggestion recently made by Mr. J. A. Ryder (Proc. U. S. Nat. Mus., 1886, p. 80). He writes: 'Structures which are disappearing should be called vestigies. Structures which are still imperfect, but are appearing, ought to be called rudiments. As it is, the word rudiment is usually misapplied so far as concerns its literal sense when speaking of rudimentary organs.'—Athenæum, Oct. 16, 1886.

vēs-tīg'-ī-al, a. [Lat. vestigium=a footprint; Eng. adj. suff. -al.] Of the nature of a trace, sign, or mark.

Biol.: A vestige. [VESTIGE, II.]

"But these are not all, or nearly all, the vestigial structures that may be seen in the Bird's skull, to say nothing of the skeleton generally; they are sufficient, however, to justify the assumption that Birds arose by secular transformation, either from the lowest and most ancient of the true Reptiles, or equally with Reptiles from archæa Amphibia, low in structure, but full of potential excellence, and ready, pro re nata, to become Reptile, Bird, or even Mammal, as the case might be."—Nature, March 22, 1888, p. 502.

ves-tī-gie, s. [VESTIGE.]

věst'-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [VEST, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: Cloth for vests.

"Fancy trouserings and vestings hold their position steadily."—London Times.

vēs'-tī-ture, s. [O. Fr.] [VESTURE, s.]

1. The manufacture or preparation of cloth.

2. Investiture.

věst'-lēt, s. [Dimin. of Eng. vest, s. (?)].

Zool.: A fanciful name for Cerianthus membranaceus = Edwardsia vestita. (Gosse: Actinologia Britannica, p. 263.) The name never came into general use.

věst'-mēnt, vest-i-ment, vest-y-ment, vest-y-mente, s. [O. Fr. vestment, vestment (Fr. vêtement), from Lat. vestimentum=a garment, from vestio=to clothe; Spanish & Ital. vestimento.] [VEST, s.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A clothing, dress, garment, or robe; a piece or part of clothing or dress, especially some article of outer clothing.

"On other thoughts meantime intent, her charge
Of folded vestments neat the princess plac'd Within the royal wain."

Couper: Homer's Odyssey, vi.

2. Ecclesiol.: A term used in several senses: (1) Any priestly garment; (2) a chasuble; (3) the whole set of Eucharistic robes—the amice, alb, girdle, stole, maniple, and chasuble, sometimes including the vestments of the deacon and sub-deacon and antependium. It was formerly held that Christian vestments were derived from those of the Jewish priests, but more probably they are only developments from the ordinary dress of the early Christians. The Roman Church makes use of five colors: White (for feasts of Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, Virgins and Confessors), red (for feasts of the Holy Ghost and Martyrs), green (for ferias), purple (in Lent and Advent), and black (in masses for the dead). By the decision in the Folkestone Ritual case (1877), the use of Eucharistic vestments is forbidden in the English Church.

vēs'-trŷ, ves-trye, subst. [Altered from O. Fr. vestiaire=the vestry in a church, from Lat. vestiarius=a wardrobe, prop. neut. sing. of vestiarius=pertaining to a vest or clothes, from vestis=dress. [VESTIARY.]] parish church. In this country the business of a vestry is confined entirely to church matters, and the term is used exclusively in connection with the Episcopal church. It is a modification of the vestry of the Church of England described below.

1. A room or place attached to an Episcopal church, in which the ecclesiastical vestments are kept, and in which the clergy, choristers, &c., robe themselves.

¶ In England the vestry of a parish consists generally of the minister, churchwardens, and chief men of the parish; and the minister, whether rector, vicar, or perpetual curate, is ex officio chairman of the meetings. Vestries are of two sorts: (1) General (or ordinary), and (2) Select. A general (or ordinary) vestry is one to which every parishioner or out-dweller assessed to or paying poor-rates has a right of admission. Its powers extend to the investigation into and restraint of the expenditure of the parish funds, the repair, alteration, or enlarging of the churches or chapels within the parish, the appointment of certain officers, as vestry-clerk, overseers, &c. A select vestry is one elected annually in certain large and populous places by the ratepayers, with powers and duties similar to those of local boards.

"The local vestries keep the roads in wretched repair."—London Globe.

B. As subst.: One who is skilled in the diseases of cattle and other domestic animals; a veterinary surgeon. [VET.]

¶ The first person who made Veterinary science a regular profession is said to have been Claude Bourgelet (1712-1799). The first veterinary school set up was at Lyons, France, in 1761.

vēt'-ī-vēr, vēt'-ī-vért, subst. [Fr.] The Khus-khus (q. v.).

vē'-tō, s. [Lat. veto=I forbid; orig.=to leave in the old state (from the same root as vetus=old); hence=to vote against change in.]

*1. Rom. Antiq.: The power possessed by the Tribunes of the People of interfering so as at once to put a stop to any measure which they deemed injurious to their order, this power being exercised by pronouncing the solemn word veto.

2. The power or right which one branch of the executive of a state has to negative the resolutions of another branch; the right of the executive branch of government of a state, as the king, president, or governor, to reject the bills, measures, or resolutions of the other branches; also the act of exercising such right. In the United States the President may veto all measures passed by congress, but after such right has been exercised, the rejected measures may be passed over the veto if carried by two-thirds of each house of congress. In Great Britain the right of veto belongs to the Crown, but has not been exercised since 1707.

3. The word whereby forbiddal was expressed in certain political assemblies, where the official language was more or less Latin, and where a single voice on the negative side could prevent the passing of a resolution otherwise unanimous; the Liberum Veto, or Free Veto, of the Polish Diets being the most famous historical instance of it. (Latham.)

4. Hence, any authoritative prohibition, refusal, negative, or interdict.

Veto Act, s.

Scottish Church: An Act of the General Assembly passed on May 27, 1834, by 184 to 138 votes. It provided that when a patron issued a presentation to a parish in favor of a minister or probationer, the disapproval of the presentee by a majority of male heads of families being communicants, should be deemed sufficient ground for his rejection, it being enacted that no objection should be valid unless the person making it was prepared to state before the Presbytery that he was not actuated by factious or malicious motives, but solely by a conscientious regard to the spiritual interests of himself or the congregation. The passing of this Act was one of the causes of the Disruption (q. v.).

vē'-tō, v. t. [VETO, s.] To put a veto on; to prohibit, to forbid, to interdict, to negative.

vē'-tō-ist, s. [Eng. veto; -ist.] One who exercises the right of veto; one who supports the use of the veto.

The lightning of the nations."

Shelley: Ode to Liberty.

vĭ'-bră-tĭle, a. [Lat. vibratilis, from vibratus, pa. par. of vibro = to vibrate (q. v.); Fr. vibratile.] Adapted to or used for vibratory motion; vibratory.

vibratile-cilia, s. pl. [CILIA, 3.]

vĭ-bră-tĭl'-ĭ-tŷ, s. [Eng. vibratil(e); -ity.] The quality or state of being vibratile; disposition to vibrate or oscillate.

făte, făt, färe, amidst, whăt, fáll, father; wĕ, wĕt, hĕre, camĕl, hĕr, thĕre; pine, pĭt, sĭre, sĭr, marĭne; gŏ, pŏt, or, wŏre, wŏlf, wŏrk, whŏ, sŏn; mŭte, cŭb, cŭre, unĭte, cŭr, rŭle, fŭll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ĕ; ey = â. qu = kw.

vī-brāt'-īng, pr. par. or a. [VIBRATE.]

vibrating-piston steam-engine, s. A steam-engine in which the power is communicated to the crank through pistons which are vibrating in their motion, and which move through an arc of a circle.

vī-brā'-tion, s. [Lat. vibratio, from vibratus, pa. par. of vibro=to vibrate (q. v.); Fr. vibration; Sp. vibración; Ital. vibrazione.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of vibrating or swinging to and fro.
2. The state of that which vibrates; oscillation. (See extract.)

"As understood in England and Germany, a vibration comprises a motion to and fro; in France, on the contrary, a vibration means a movement to or fro."—Ganot; Physics (ed. Atkinson), § 220.

3. A resonant sound; a resonance.

"The deep vibrations of his witching song."

Thomson: Castle of Indolence, i. 20.

II. Technically:

1. Physics: The reciprocating motion of a body, as of a pendulum, a musical chord, elastic plate, the air or the ether. The term oscillation is, however, more frequently used to denote a slow reciprocating motion, as that of a pendulum which is produced by the action of gravity on the whole mass of the body; while vibration is generally confined to a motion having quick reciprocations, as that of a sonorous body, and proceeding from the reciprocal action of the molecules of the body on each other when their state of equilibrium has been disturbed.

2. Philos. & Physiol.: A sensorial motion. [SEN-SORIAL-MOTIONS.]

vī-brā'-ti-ūn-cle (ti as shī), s. [Eng. vibration (on); dimin. suff. -uncle.] A small vibration. [VIBRATION, II. 2.]

"The renewed vibration being less vigorous than the original one (unless when excited by the presence of the object, or in certain morbid cases) is called a miniature vibration or vibratiuncle."—Belsham: Philos. of the Mind, § 4.

vī-brā-tive, a. [Eng. vibrat(e); -ive.] Vibrating, vibratory.

"Heat is only an accident of light, occasioned by the rays putting a fine, subtle, ethereal medium, which pervades all bodies, into a vibrative motion, which gives us that sensation."—Newton.

vī-brā-tōr-ŷ, a. [Eng. vibrat(e); -ory; Fr. vibratoire.]

1. Vibrating; consisting of or belonging to vibration or oscillation.

"The vibratory agitations of light and of air."—Belsham: Philos. of the Mind, § 4.

2. Causing vibration.

vī-brī-ō, subst. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. vibro=to shake, to quiver.]

*1. Zoöl.: The type-genus of Ehrenberg's Vibrionidae (q. v.). It approximately corresponds to the modern genus Anguillula (q. v.). Used also of any individual of the genus.

*2. Bot.: According to Cohn, a genus of Schizomycetes, but Grove (Bacteria and Yeast Fungi) classes that genus and Ophidomonas (Ehrenberg) with Spirillum, which he thus defines: Cells cylindrical or slightly compressed, simply arcuate, or spirally twisted, rigid, with a flagellum at each end (doubtful in some species). Multiplication by transverse division, the daughter-cells for the most part soon separating. At times, also, a zoogloea is formed. The species are found in infusions, in brackish water, and in the slime of the teeth. Zopf asserted that minute spherical "cocci," short rodlets ("bacteria"), longer rodlets ("bacilli"), and filamentous ("leptothrix") forms, as well as curved and spiral threads ("vibrio," "spirillum"), &c., occur as vegetative stages in one and the same Schizomycete. (Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xxi. 399.)

"It may be noted that Vibrio is here [i. e., in Ehrenberg's Die Infusionstierchen, p. 75] conceived to be naturally straight-lined, but capable of bending in undulations of a serpentine form, being thus distinguished from Spirillum by the fact that the undulations lie all in one plane. But most modern observers are agreed that the species referred to Vibrio belong to two classes—the one, in which the undulations are serpentine, being merely Bacillus; the other, in which they are spiral, being undistinguishable from Spirillum. This is, therefore, another reason . . . why the name Vibrio should be dropped."—W. B. Grove: Bacteria and Yeast Fungi, p. 69.

vī-brī-ōn-al, a. [Modern Latin vibrio, genit. vibrion(is); Eng. suff. -al.] Of, belonging to, or induced by vibrios. In the last sense the word is incorrectly employed, the fungi of the genus Spirillum and the lapsed genus Vibrio not being pathogenicous.

"Virchow, who examined a sample, considered the granules found on these growths as not fungoid, but vibrional."—Blyth: Dict. Hygiene, p. 72.

bōll, bōy; pōūt, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șūn; -țion, -șion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = șūș. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

vī-brī-ōn'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vibrio, genit. vibrion(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Zoöl.: A lapsed family of Ehrenberg's Infusoria. These organisms are now known to be Nematoid Worms, and are classed in the family Anguillulidae (q. v.).

vī-brīs'-sæ, s. pl. [Lat.=the small hairs in the nostrils, so called, according to Festus, because their extraction causes a person to shake his head.]

Biol.: Hairs or bristles attached to the lips of many mammals, and especially developed in the Carnivora and Rodentia. The vibrissæ are organs of touch, and give warning of external obstacles, and branches of the fifth pair of nerves are distributed to their roots. Cats are rendered unable to catch mice when their whiskers are removed, and various experiments have shown that rabbits, without the assistance of their eyes, can by means of these hairs, find an outlet in narrow passages. Popularly known as Smellers and Whiskers. In many birds the nasal apertures are covered with stiff, imperfect feathers (also called bristles), to which the name Vibrissæ is sometimes applied. These, however, are not organs of touch, but serve to prevent the nostrils becoming obstructed by dust.

vī-brō-scōpe, subst. [Eng. vibra(tion), and Gr. skopeō=to see, to observe.] An instrument invented by Duhamel for graphically recording the vibrations of a tuning-fork, by means of an attached style on a piece of smoked paper gummed around a cylinder. The fork is made to vibrate, and the cylinder turned, the style making a mark whose waves correspond to the number of vibrations in a second.

vī-būr'-nic, adj. [Eng. viburnum, n.] Derived from the viburnum.

viburnic-acid, s.

Chem.: A term formerly applied to an acid found in the bark of the guelder-rose, probably valeric acid.

vī-būr'-nūm, s. [Lat.=the wayfaring-tree.]

Bot.: Guelder-rose; a genus of Sambucæ. Shrubs or trees with opposite branches, simple leaves, and terminal or axillary panicles of white or pink flowers; calyx limb five-cleft, corolla campanulate or funnel-shaped, five-lobed; stamens five, stigmas three, sessile, ovary one to three celled; fruit an inferior one-seeded berry. Species numerous. The branches yield a yellow dye. [GUELDER-ROSE.] V. tinus is the Laurustinus (q. v.). An oil extracted from the seeds of V. coriaceum, a large Himalayan shrub, is used by the Nepaulese for food and for burning. The fruit of V. cotinifolium, V. foetens, V. nervosum, and V. stellulatum, Himalayan shrubs, are eaten by the natives. The wood of V. erubescens, a small Himalayan tree, is very hard, close, and even-grained.

vic'-ar, *vic-aire, *vic-are, *vic-ar-ie, *vic-ar-ye, *vik-er, *vyk-er, s. [Fr. vicaire=a vicar, a deputy, from Lat. vicarium, accus. of vicarius=a substitute, a deputy, from vicis=a turn, change, succession; Spanish & Ital. vicario; Port. vigário.] [VICE, pref.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: A deputy; a person deputed or authorized to perform the duties or functions of another.

"They might appoint a deputy or vicar to do it for them."—Spelman: On Tythes, ch. xxix.

2. Eng. Canon Law: The priest of a parish, the predial tithes of which are impropriated or appropriated; that is, belong to a chapter or religious house, or to a layman who receives them and allows the vicar only the smaller tithes or a salary. [RECTOR.]

"These appropriating corporations, or religious houses, were wont to depute one of their own body to perform divine service in those parishes of which the society was thus the parson. This officiating minister was in reality no more than a curate, deputy, or vicegerent of the appropriator, and, therefore, called vicarius or vicar."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. i., ch. 12.

¶ Vicar of Christ: A title in the early Church common to all bishops, but now confined to the Pope.

vicar-apostolic, s.

Roman Church: A name formerly given to a bishop or archbishop, generally of some remote see, to whom the Pope delegated a portion of his authority, or to any ecclesiastic invested with power to exercise episcopal jurisdiction in some place where the ordinary was for some reason incapable of discharging his duties efficiently. Now vicars-apostolic, who are nearly always titular bishops, are appointed where no episcopate has been established, or where the succession has been interrupted. There are at present a large number of such vicariates in existence.

1. A priest-vicar; a minor-canon (q. v.).
2. A lay-vicar (q. v.).

vicar-forane, s.

Roman Church: A dignitary or parish priest appointed by a bishop to exercise a limited jurisdiction in a particular town or district of his diocese. The chief duty of vicars-forane is to maintain ecclesiastical discipline, report to the bishop on the lives of the clergy, to preside at their local conferences, the care of sick priests, the administration of Church property, and the maintenance of sacred buildings. In Ireland almost their sole function is to grant episcopal dispensations for the non-publication of banns.

vicar-general, s.

1. Roman Church: A clerk, usually (but not necessarily) in holy orders, and having a degree in canon law, appointed by a bishop to assist in the discharge of episcopal functions. In matters of jurisdiction the vicar-general is regarded as the ordinary, and there is no appeal from the former to the latter; but the vicar-general may not do any of those things which belong to the episcopal order. A bishop is not obliged to appoint a vicar-general, but may appoint two or more if necessary. The office corresponds closely to that of an archdeacon (q. v.) in the early and mediæval church.

2. Anglican Church: An officer employed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and some other bishops to assist in such matters as ecclesiastical causes and visitations.

vic'-ar-age (age as īg), vic'-ar-idge, *vyc-rage, s. [Eng. vicar; -age.]

*1. The condition or state of a substitute or deputy; substitution.

"They have sole jurisdiction, and the presbyters only in substitution or vicaridge."—Bp. Taylor: Episcopacy Asserted, § 50.

2. The benefice of a vicar.

"Some vicarages are more liberally, and some more scantily, endowed."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. i., ch. 12.

3. The house or residence of a vicar.

vic'-ar-ess, subst. [Eng. vicar; -ess.] A female vicar. Also used of the wife of a vicar when she has the character of interfering in parish business.

"Mother Austin was afterward *vicar*ess several years."—Archæologia, xxviii. 198.

vī-cār'-ī-al, a. [Eng. vicar; -ial.]

1. Of or pertaining to a vicar; small.

"In some parishes rectorial, and in some vicarial tithes."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. i., ch. 11.

2. Vicarious, delegated.

"All derived and vicarial power shall be done away, as no further necessary."—Blackwell: Sacred Classics, ii. (Pref., p. xxix.)

3. Holding the office of or acting as a vicar.

"But the great proprietors of land soon found the inconvenience of a ministry so precarious and distant, intolerable; and obtained for each a resident pastor, either rectorial or vicarial, either an incumbent or a substitute."—Knox: Sermons, vol. vi., ser. 26.

vī-cār'-ī-an, s. [Eng. vicar; -ian.] A vicar.

vī-cār'-ī-ate, *vī-cār'-ī-āt, a. & s. [Low Latin vicariatus.]

*A. As adj.: Having delegated power; delegated.

"Held up by the vicariat authority of our See."—Barrow: Works, i. 261.

B. As substantive:

*1. The office, position, or power of a vicar; a delegated office or power; vicarship.

"Rules the church by a vicariate of his spirit."—Bp. Hall: Revelation Revealed.

2. The jurisdiction of a vicar-apostolic (q. v.).

"The College of the Propaganda Fide has divided the hitherto existing Apostolic Vicariate of Natal into three jurisdictions."—London Daily Telegraph.

vī-cār'-ī-ōūs, a. [Lat. vicarius.] [VICAR.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or belonging to a vicar, deputy, or substitute; deputed, delegated; as, vicarious power or authority.

2. Acting for or on behalf of another; acting as a deputy, delegate, or substitute; as, a vicarious agent.

3. Performed, done, or suffered for or instead of another; suffered or done by deputy.

"The death of Christ was . . . a vicarious punishment of sin."—Waterland: Works, vii. 72.

II. Medicine: Occurring in one place instead of another; as, a vicarious secretion.

vī-cār'-ī-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. vicarious; -ly.] In a vicarious manner; as deputy, delegate, or substitute for another; by means of a deputy or substitute.

"Their preparation is most of it done vicariously, through their dressmakers."—London Daily Telegraph.

vic'-ar-ship, s. [Eng. vicar; -ship.] The office of a vicar; the ministry of a vicar.

bōll, bōy; pōūt, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șūn; -țion, -șion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = șūș. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

vic-ar-y, *vic-ar-ye, s. [VICAR.]

vīce (1), vīçe (1), vis, s. [Fr. vice, from Lat. vitium=a vice, a fault.]

1. A fault, a blemish, a defect, an imperfection.

"You have a vice of mercy in you."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, v. 3.

2. Any immoral or evil habit or practice; any evil habit or practice in which a person indulges; a moral fault or failing; immorality; customary deviation in a single respect or in general from a right standard; specif., the indulgence of immoral, immoral, or degrading appetites or passions.

"Let me persuade you to think of that vice which, from experience and from the testimony of others, is degrading your life."—Canon Knox-Little, in London Echo.

3. Depravity or corruption of manners. (Used in a general or collective sense, and without any plural; as, an age of vice.)

4. A fault; a bad habit or trick in a horse.

*5. The general title of the buffoon of the old moralities or moral plays. Often named after one specific vice, as Iniquity, Covetousness, Fraud, &c.

"Like to the old Vice . . .

Who with dagger of lath,

In his rage and his wrath,

Ories, ah, hal to the devil!"

Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, iv. 2.

vice-bitten, a. Corrupted with vice; a prey to vice.

"What a paltry creature is a man vice-bitten."—Richardson: Sir C. Grandison, vi. 181.

vīce (2), vīse, *vīçe (2), vys, *vysse, s. & a. [Fr. vis (O. Fr. viz)=a vice, a spindle of a press, a winding stair, from Lat. vitis=a vine, bryony, lit.=that which winds or twines; cf. Ital. vite=a vine, a vice, a screw.]

A. As substantive:

1. Literally:

1. A winding stair, a spiral staircase.

"Then an angel came downe from the stage on hygh by a vyce."—Caxton: Chronicle of England, pt. vii., p. 136 b.

2. An instrument with two jaws, between which an object may be clamped securely, leaving both hands free for work. The hand-vice is not a vice proper, but has a tang which is grasped by one hand, while the other holds the tool to work upon the object held.

"The maine planke or upper stocke of the presse, went with a vice in manner of a skrew."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xviii., ch. xxxi.

3. Plumb.: A tool used by plumbers for drawing lead into flat grooved rods, called pames, for lattice-windows.

II. Fig.: Grasp, gripe.

"An' I but fist him once, an' a' come but within my vice."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., ii. 1.

B. As adj.: Winding, spiral.

"There were somtyme houses with vyce arches and voules in the maner of rome."—Caxton: Descript. Britain, p. 16.

vīce-, pref. [Fr., from Latin vice=in place of, from viciis (genit.)=a turn, change, stead.] A prefix, denoting in its compounds, one who acts in place or as deputy of another, or one second in rank; as, vice-president, vice-chairman, &c.

¶ (1) In colloquial language it is frequently used independently as a noun, the compound for which it stands being indicated in the context.

"Mr. Dumkins acting as chairman, and Mr. Luffey officiating as vice."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. vii.

(2) It is also commonly used as a preposition or adverb, with the force of "in the place of," "to succeed."

vice-admiral, s.

*1. The second commander of a fleet. [In the United States it is provided by law that the naval ranks of admiral and vice-admiral shall cease at the death of the persons now holding those offices.]

"The vice-admiral in the middle of the fleet, with a great squadron of gallies, struck sail directly."—Knolles: Hist. Turkes.

2. [ADMIRAL, ¶.]

vice-admiralty, s.

1. The office of a vice-admiral.

"The vice-admiralty is exercised by Mr. Trevanion."—Carew.

2. A vice-admiralty court.

Vice-admiralty Courts: Tribunals established in the British possessions beyond the seas, with jurisdiction over maritime causes, including those relating to prizes.

vice-agent, s. One who acts in place of another.

"A vassal Satan hath made his vice-agent, to cross whatever the faithful ought to do."—Hooker.

vice-chair, s.

1. The seat occupied by a vice-chairman.

2. A vice-chairman (q. v.).

vice-chairman, s. A deputy chairman; also one who occupies the seat at the end of the table, facing the chairman.

vice-chamberlain, s. The deputy of a chamberlain; in the English royal household, the deputy of the Lord Chamberlain.

vice-chancellor, s. An officer next in rank to a chancellor; the deputy of a chancellor:

1. Eng. Law: A judge in the Chancery division of the High Court of Justice in England, holding a separate court. The office was abolished by the Judicature Act. [JUDGE, s., II. 1.] The first Vice-Chancellor was appointed in 1813; the last holder of the office was Sir James Bacon, who retired Nov. 11, 1886. In Ireland there is a Vice-Chancellor, and the judge of the local Court of Chancery of the Duchy of Lancaster is also styled a Vice-Chancellor.

¶ In some of the states of the Union there exists a judicial office analogous to the British institution described above. The office usually has a purely civil jurisdiction.

2. Univ.: An officer who acts as deputy of the chancellor, discharging nearly all the duties of the latter in his absence.

"Over each university also there is a seuerall chancellor, whose offices are perpetuall, howbeit their substitutes, whom we call vice-chancellors, are changed euery yeare."—Holinshead: Descript. England, bk. ii., ch. iii.

vice-chancellorship, s. The office or dignity of a vice-chancellor.

vice-consul, s. An officer who acts in place of a consul; a subordinate officer to whom consular functions are delegated, in some particular part of a district already under the jurisdiction of a consul.

vice-king, s. One who acts in the place of a king; a viceroy.

"His deputie or vice-king seeing us at sea, came with his canoe to us."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 739.

vice-legate, subst. A subordinate, assistant, or deputy legate.

vice-presidency, s. The office or position of a vice-president.

vice-president, s. One who holds office next to a president.

¶ The Vice-President of the United States: The Vice-President is the second executive officer of the United States, and is elected at the same time and in the same manner as the President. During the life and active health of the President his executive functions are in abeyance, his duties being confined to the presidency of the senate during the sessions of Congress. In the senate he has no vote, except in case of a tie between the opposing parties on a division of the house. Then, as is usual with parliamentary presiding officer, he has the casting vote. In the event of the death or incapability of the President, the Vice-President assumes the duties of the office and continues to discharge them (in case of the President's death) till the end of the term for which the two were elected, or (in case of temporary disability) till the disability of the President shall have passed away. Several times in the history of the country has the Vice-President been called to the Presidential chair—the first case being that of John Tyler, who succeeded W. H. Harrison; then came Millard Fillmore, who succeeded Zachary Taylor; Andrew Johnson, who succeeded Abraham Lincoln, and Chester A. Arthur, who succeeded James A. Garfield; then Theodore Roosevelt, who succeeded William McKinley.

vice, v. t. [VICE (2), s.]

1. To press or squeeze with, or as with, a vice; to hold in, or as in, a vice.

2. To screw; to force or press, as in a vice.

"As he had seen 't or been an instrument

To vice you to 't." Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, i. 2.

viced, a. [Eng. vic(e), (1), s.; -ed.] Vicious, wicked, corrupt. [See extract under HIGH-VICED.]

vīce-gēr'-eņce, *vīce-gēr'-eņ-çy, s. [English, vicegeren(t); -ce, -cy.] The office of a vicegerent; deputed power; lieutenantancy; agency under another.

"To the great vicegerency I grew,

Being a title as supreme as new."

Drayton: Legend of Thomas Cromwell.

vīce-gēr'-eņt, a. & s. [Latin vice=in place of, and gerens, pr. par. of gero=to carry on, to act, to rule.]

A. As adjective:

1. Having or exercising delegated power; acting as a vicegerent, or in the place of another.

"But whom send I to judge them? whom but Thee Vicegerent Son?" Milton: P. L., x. 56.

*2. Carried out or exercised under delegated authority.

"Under his great vicegerent reign abide United, as one individual soul."

Milton: P. L., v. 609.

B. As subst.: An officer deputed by a superior or proper authority to exercise the powers or functions of another; one acting with delegated authority; a deputy, a substitute.

"To haue the autoritie as a notable vicegerent in so excellent and paynefull an office."—Udall: Timothy i.

vīce'-mān, s. [Eng. vice (2), s.; and man.] A man who works at a vice; specifically, a smith who works at a vice instead of an anvil.

vīç'-eņ-ar-ỹ, a. [Latin vicenarius, from viceni=twenty each; viginti=twenty.] Pertaining to or consisting of twenty.

vī-çeņ'-nī-āl, c. [Lat. viceni=twenty each, and annus=a year.] Lasting or continuing twenty years.

vicennial-prescription, s.

Scots Law: A prescription of twenty years; one of the lesser prescriptions which is pleadable against holograph bonds not attested by witnesses.

vīce-rē'-gal, a. [Pref. vice-, and English regal.] Of or pertaining to a viceroy or to viceroyalty.

"No public ceremony could be performed in a becoming manner under the Viceregal roof."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

vīce'-rōy, s. [Fr. viceroi, from vice=in place of, and roi=king.] A vice-king; one who acts as the governor or ruler of a kingdom, country, or province in the place and name of the sovereign, and with regal authority.

vīce-rōy'-āl-tỹ, s. [Eng. viceroy; -alty.] The dignity, office, or jurisdiction of a viceroy.

"So important a concentration of Imperial authority over Ireland as would be implied in the definite abolition of the viceroyalty."—London Daily Telegraph.

vīce'-rōy'-ship, s. [English viceroy; -ship.] The dignity or office of a viceroy; viceroyalty.

vīç'-ē-tỹ, s. [Eng. vice (1), s.; -ty.] Fault, defect, imperfection. (Ben Jonson: Love's Welcome at Welbeck.)

vī'-çě vēr'-sā, phr. [Latin=the turn being changed.] Contrariwise; on the contrary; the reverse; the terms or the case being reversed.

vīç'-ī-ā, s. [Lat.=a vetch.]

Bot.: Vetch, Tare; the typical genus of Vicia (q. v.). Climbing or diffuse herbs with abruptly pinnate leaves, nearly always ending in a tendril. Flowers in axillary racemes, blue, purple, or yellow; wings of the corolla adnate to the keel; style filiform, with the upper part hairy all round, or with a tuft of hair beneath the stigma. Known species about a hundred; from the north temperate zone of South America. One of the most common is Vicia hirsuta, which is found in cornfields and hedges. It has weak, straggling, and climbing stems, two or three feet long, and insignificant pale blue flowers. V. cracca, found in bushy places, has numerous and fine bluish-purple flowers. V. orobus, with unilateral racemes of purplish-white flowers, and V. sylvatica, with numerous and very beautiful flowers—white streaked with bluish veins—are found in rocky or mountainous regions. V. sepium, with dull pale purple flowers, is frequent in woods and shady places, while V. lutea flourishes best near the sea. V. sativa has six to ten leaflets, one or two axillary, nearly sessile flowers, and silky legumes. It is frequent in cultivated ground. V. lathyroides, is a small species, with two to six leaflets, and solitary flowers. Vicia faba is the Common Bean. [BEAN.]

vīç'-ī-āte (c as sh), v. t. & i. [VITIATE.]

vīç'-ī-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vici(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eae.]

Bot.: A tribe of Papilionaceae. The ten filaments of the stamens, or at least nine of them, connate; cotyledons fleshy; leaves generally cirrhose. Genera: Cicer, Pisum, Ervum, Vicia, Lathyrus, &c.

vīç'-īn-age (age as īg), voi-sin-age, s. [Prob. voisinage, from Fr. voisinage=neighborhood, from voisin=neighboring, from Lat. vicinus, accus. of vicinus=neighboring, near; lit.=belonging to the same street, from vicus (whence A. S. wic; Eng. wick=a town)=a street; cogn. with Gr. oikos=a house; Sansc. veça=a house, an entrance; vīç=to live.]

1. Neighborhood; the place or places near to or adjoining each other; vicinity.

"To summon the Protestant gentry of the vicinage to the rescue."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

1. Rom. Mythol.: One of the deities of the Romans, called by the Greeks Nikē. She was Sister of Strength and Valor, and was one of the attendants of Jupiter. Sylla raised her a temple at Rome, and instituted festivals in her honor. She was represented with wings, crowned with laurel, and holding the branch of a palm-tree in her hand.

2. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 12.]

3. Botany: A genus of Euryalidæ (q. v.), akin to Euryale, from which it differs by the sepals being deciduous, by the petals gradually passing into stamens, and by the cells of the ovary being more numerous. Species, one or three. The type is Victoria regia, named by Lindley after Queen Victoria. It is the most magnificent of all known water-lilies, and is the more acceptable that it came from a region in which it had been supposed that no Nymphæacæ occurred. It was first discovered by the botanist Hænke in 1801; Bonpland afterward met with it. Orbigny, in 1828, sent home specimens to Paris; others also subsequently saw it growing, but it excited no attention till, in 1837, Sir Robert Schomburgk found it in the Berbice River in British Guiana. The rootstock is thick and fleshy, the leaf-stalks prickly, the leaf peltate, its margin circular, its diameters from six to twelve feet, the edge so turned up as to make the leaves floating in tranquil water look like a number of large trays. The leaves are green above, and covered with small bosses, below they are deep purple or violet; the undeveloped flowers are pyriform; the sepals four, each about seven inches long by four broad, purple externally, whitish internally; the petals numerous, in several rows, passing insensibly into stamens, fragrant, the outer ones white, the inner ones roseate; stamens numerous, the outer fertile, the inner sterile; ovary many celled, cup-shaped above, with many small stigmas along its upper margin; fruit a prickly berry. A native of South American rivers, especially the tributaries of the Amazon. The seeds are said to be eatable, and the plant is in consequence called Water Maize by the natives of the region where it grows.

Victoria.

4. Vehicles: A park-carriage, having a low seat for two persons, a calash-top, and an elevated driver's seat in front.

"With silent morosity he hands her into her victoria."—Rhoda Broughton: Second Thoughts, vol. ii., pt. ii., ch. viii.

¶ Royal Order of Victoria and Albert: An order instituted by Queen Victoria, Feb. 10, 1862, in memory of the Prince Consort, who died Dec. 14, 1861. It was enlarged Oct. 10, 1864, Nov. 15, 1865, and again on March 15, 1880. It consists of her Majesty, as Sovereign of the Order, and fifteen ladies of the Royal families of Europe, who form the First class. The second class consists of eight ladies of the Royal families of Europe, and related to the British royal family. The third class includes twenty-one lady members of the British nobility, and the fourth class fifteen lady members of the nobility and gentry. The badge is composed of likenesses in profile of her Majesty and Prince Albert, surmounted by a border of precious stones (different for each class) for the first, second and third, and the monogram "V. A." for the fourth class, all surmounted by an Imperial crown. Ribbon, white moiré.

Victoria Cross, s. A British naval and military decoration instituted by royal warrant, Jan. 29, 1856, and bestowed for "conspicuous bravery or devotion" to the country in the presence of the enemy. It is the most coveted of all British decorations, and is open to all officers and men of the regular, auxiliary, and reserve forces. It consists of a bronze Maltese cross with the royal crest in the center, and underneath an escrol bearing the inscription, "For Valour." It is worn attached to the breast by a blue ribbon in the case of the navy, and by a red in the case of the army. For every additional act of bravery an additional clasp may be added. The cross carries with it a special pension of £10 a year, and each additional clasp an additional pension of £5 a year.

Victoria crowned-pigeon, s.

Ornith.: Goura victoria, a large pigeon from New Guinea and the adjacent islands. I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act or state of keeping awake; abstinence from sleep at the natural or ordinary hours of rest; sleeplessness; hence, the state of being awake or watchful; watchfulness, wakefulness, watch.

"His delicate frame worn out by the labors and vigils of many months."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

2. Devotional watching; hence, devotions, service, praise, prayer, or the like, performed during the customary hours of rest; nocturnal devotions.

II. Ecclesiastical and Church History:

1. Originally the watch kept on the night before a feast, then (from the eleventh or twelfth century) the day and night preceding a feast. The practice of spending the night in public prayer, which is probably older than Christianity, prevailed in the early Church, and down to the fourteenth century was the usual prelude to the greater festivals. But there were many objections to the custom, which, from about that date was gradually discontinued. In the Roman Church the Midnight Mass before the feast of Christmas is the only relic of the old custom. [WATCHNIGHT.] Broadly speaking, the vigils of the Roman Church have been transferred to the English Prayer Book. Theoretically, all vigils are fast-days, but in the Roman Church the customs of different countries vary slightly.

2. The devotional exercises or services appropriate to the vigil or eve of a festival.

*Vigils or Watchings of flowers:

Bot.: The rendering of Lat. vigiliae, the name used by Linnæus (Syst. Nat., ed. 13th, ii. 20) to describe the faculty possessed by certain plants of opening and closing their flowers at certain hours of the day. He places it under the heading Horologium. [FLORAL-CLOCK.]

vīg'-il-ānce, *vīg'-il-ence, s. [Fr., from Lat. vigilantia, from vigilans=vigilant (q. v.); Sp. & Port. vigilancia; Ital. vigilanza.]

1. The quality or state of being vigilant or watchful; attention of the mind in discovering or guarding against danger, or in providing for safety; watchfulness, wariness, circumspection.

"They . . . made haste to make appear With righteous plea, their utmost vigilance."

Milton: P. L., x. 30.

*2. Forbearance of sleep; wakefulness.

"Ulysses yielded unreasonably to sleep, and the strong passion for his country should have given him vigilance."—Broomé.

*3. A guard, a watch.

"In at this gate none pass

The vigilance." Milton: P. L., iv. 580.

vigilance-committee, s.

1. A committee or body formed to watch the progress or carrying out of some measure, or for the purpose of protecting certain interests supposed to be imperiled, or for restraining any abuse or nuisance.

2. In this country the term vigilance committee is used to denote a band of citizens organized to summarily punish crime, or prevent the commission of crime, in such instances as the civil and lawfully constituted authorities seem powerless to reach these desired results.

¶ The vigilance committee has never been a popular institution in the older portions of the Union, but has found its principal growth in the newly settled communities, and especially in those localities in which the presence of a large foreign element seemed at times to menace the preservation of good order, life and property. The most noted vigilance committees in the history of the country were those formed in San Francisco, and contiguous territory in the Western States, and in New Orleans, in the southern portion of the Union. In the earlier years of San Francisco the city was so overrun with the lawless element among the miners and adventurers that the administration of justice became in the hands of the constituted authorities but a travesty. It was then that the work of the vigilance committee, or Vigilantes, as they were styled, began. That work was short, sharp and terrible. Thieves and murderers were hanged on every side, while others were forced to seek safety in flight. As the mining operations extended eastward into Nevada and Montana, the work of the vigilance committee was again called into requisition, with the happy effect of clearing the country, for a time at least, of a large portion of the lawless element. One of the most noted members of the Montana vigilance committee was "Judge" Alexander Davis, under whose direction the notorious outlaw Slade was hanged at Virginia City early in the sixties. Slade had himself been a most useful man in clearing the country of desperadoes, but had, under the influence of drink, committed some notorious and heinous crimes. He was warned to amend his ways, but defied the court and threatened the judge with a loaded pistol. The result was that he was overpowered and taken by a body of several hundred miners and hanged. In New Orleans the last instance of the organization of a vigilance committee was in 1891, when a body of citizens took from the city jail a number of Italians, suspected of being members of the Italian fraternity of murderers known as the Mafia, and accused of being the murderers of Chief of Police David Hennessey, and put them to death by shooting and hanging. This action produced serious complications between the Italian government and that of this country, and partook more of the nature of mob violence than the work of the vigilance committees of the Western States, who to excuse their actions could truthfully allege the inability of the civil authorities to meet the exigencies of the case. Directly after the civil war, there were frequent lynchings of murderers and ravishers in the South, but these actions were rather those of an infuriated mob than those of a well-organized, coolly-conducted committee. In various rural districts, bands of men under different names have attempted to mete out punishment to obnoxious persons, but these efforts have been generally sternly repressed by the authorities. [WHITECAPS.]

"But at least it is well that the lawless and offensive zeal of vigilance-committees has received a decisive check."—People, April 22, 1888.

vig-il-an-çy, s. [Eng. vigilanc(e); -y.] Vigilance.

"Their vigilancy is honored with this heavenly vision."—Bp. Hall: Cont.; Birth of Christ.

vik-ing, vi-king, subst. [Icel. vikingr=a freebooter, rover, pirate, lit.=a creek-dweller, from vik=a creek, inlet, bay; suff. -ingr (A. S. -ing)=son of, belonging to; Sw. vik; Dan. vig=a creek, cove; Icel. vikja=to turn, to veer, to trend, to recede.] A rover, freebooter, or pirate; used especially in the Icelandic sagas of the bands of Scandinavian warriors who, during the ninth and tenth centuries, harried the British Isles and Normandy. From a misapprehension of the etymology, the second pronunciation is often used, the word being confounded with sea-king, with which it is wholly unconnected. A sea-king was a man of royal blood, and entitled to the name of king when in command even of a single ship; the sea-kings were often vikings, but not every viking was a sea-king.

¶ The vikings were prettily commemorated at the World's Columbian Exposition by an exact reproduction of an old Norse battleship, sent to this country by the Scandinavians.

vil-ains-ly, adv. [VILLAINOUSLY.]

vil'-lain, vil'-lein, *vil'-ayn, *vil'-ein, *vil'-eyn, *vil'-laine, s. & a. [O. French vilein=servile, base; villain=a villain, bondsman, servile tenant, from Lat. villanus=a farm-servant, a serf, from villa=a farm.]

A. As substantive:

*1. A serf or peasant attached to a villa or farm. "We yield not ourselves to be your villains and slaves [non in servitatem nos tradimus], but as allies to be protected by you."—P. Holland: Livy, p. 935.

2. A member of the lowest class of unfree persons under the feudal system; a feudal serf. A villain had in respect of persons other than his lord, all the rights and privileges of a freeman, but in respect of his lord he had no rights, save that the lord might not kill or maim him, nor ravish his females. The villain could not acquire or hold any property against his lord's will, and he was obliged to perform all the menial services demanded of him by his lord; the house and land occupied by him were held solely at the will of the lord. Villains were of two classes: (1) Regardant and (2) in gross. The former were annexed to the soil (adscripti or adscripti glebæ) belonging to a manor as a fixture, and passing with it when sold or inherited. They could not be sold or transferred separate from the land. Villains in gross were not annexed to a manor, but belonged personally to their lord, who could sell or transfer them at pleasure. If they ran away or were purloined they might be recovered by action like beasts or other chattels. [VILLENAGE.]

"This they called villénage, and the tenants villeins, probably a villa, because they lived chiefly in villages, which they could not leave without the lord's permission."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii, ch. 6.

3. An ignoble, base-born person generally; a boor, a clown.

4. A person extremely depraved, and guilty or capable of great crimes; a vile, wicked wretch; a scoundrel, a rascal, a wretch.

"O villain! villain! his very opinion in the letter.
Abhorred villain! unnatural, detested, brutish villain!"—Shakesp.: Lear, i. 2.

5. Sometimes used in a less opprobrious sense, particularly in addresses, and sometimes even as a term of endearment.

"Sweet villain! most dearest! my collop."—Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, i. 2.

*B. As adjective:

1. Vile, base, villainous.

"The villain Jew."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, ii. 8.

2. Appropriate to or characteristic of a villain or slave; servile, base.

"Villain bonds and despot sway."

Byron: (Annandale.)

*vil'-lain, *vil'-ayn, v. t. [VILLAIN, s.] To disgrace, to degrade, to debase.

villein-socage, s.

Old Eng. Law: A species of tenure of lands held of the king by certain villein or base services. [VILLENAGE.]

vill'-ēm-ite, s. [WILLEMITE.]

vil'-lěn-age (age as íg), s. [VILLAIN.]

1. Feudal Law: A tenure of land by base services; the tenure of a villain. It was of two kinds: (1) Pure villénage, where the service was base in its nature and undefined as to time and amount, and (2) privileged villénage (also called villein socage), in which the service, although of a base nature, was certain and defined. When lands held in villénage descended from father to son in uninterrupted succession, the occupiers or villeins became entitled by prescription or custom to hold their lands against the lord, so long as they performed the services required of them under their tenure, and according to the custom of the manor. These customs were preserved and evidenced in the rolls of the several courts-baron in which they were entered or kept on foot by the constant immemorial usage of the several manors in which the lands lay. Tenants holding such lands, having nothing to show as title to their estates but the entries in these rolls, or copies of them authenticated by the stewards, came in time to be called tenants by copy of court-roll, and their tenure copyhold. [COPYHOLD.]

"Some faint traces of the institution of villénage were detected by the curious so late as the days of the Stuarts."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. i.

vine, vyne, s. [Fr. vigne=a vine, from Latin vineā=(1) a vineyard, (2) a kind of pent-house for sheltering besiegers; prop. fem. sing. of vineus=of or pertaining to wine, from vinum=wine; cogn. with Greek oinos=wine; oinē=the vine; oinas=the vine, grape, wine; A. S. winegærd=a vineyard.] [WINE.]

1. Botany:

(1) The genus Vitis (q. v.), and spec. Vitis vinifera, the Common or Grape Vine. It is a climbing plant furnished with tendrils. The leaves are lobed, pinnately toothed, naked, or downy; the flowers, as in other species, small, greenish, in panicles opposite the leaves; its berries, called grapes, oval, large, juicy, growing in clusters or bunches, are the finest of fruits. The native country of the vine is the region south of the Caspian Sea, Armenia, and the adjacent regions, extending perhaps to the northwestern Himalaya. From a very early period, it was cultivated in Western Asia and Egypt (Gen. ix. 20, 21; xl. 10), whence it has spread to all the parts of the world suitable for its cultivation. The climate and soil of central and southern California are especially adapted for the cultivation of the grape-vine. They are produced in great abundance and varieties, and the manufacturing of wines is a leading industry. It thrives best on the sunny sides of hills between 32° and 50° N. Its fruit is made into wine or brandy; the dried fruits of some varieties constitute raisins [RAISIN], while those of another variety are the currants of commerce [CURRANT]. It flourishes best in districts or countries where there are not late frosts in spring, or hot autumns. It prefers a deep, loose, rocky soil, where its roots may penetrate deeply, and gain access to moisture, while the surface soil is parched. Local situation as well as soil has much effect on the fruit. There are many varieties. One of the easiest to cultivate is the Black Hamburg or Frankenthal vine.

(2) The long slender stem of any plant that trails along the ground, or climbs and supports itself by winding round a fixed object, or by seizing any fixed thing by its tendrils, or clasps; as, a hop vine, a cucumber vine, &c.

A military engine; named from its resemblance to a bower formed of vine-branches. (See extract.)

"Wherefore fortifying his camp he made vines (an instrument of war made of timber and hurdles for men to go under safely to the walls of a town)."—Goldinge: Cæsar, fol. 52.

vine-bower, s.

Bot.: Clematis viticella.

vine-bunch, s. A bunch of grapes.

"Between the shadows of the vine-bunches floated the glowing sunlights as she moved."—Tennyson: Enone, 177.

vine-clad, a. Covered or clad with vines.

"In an oriel on the summer side, Vine-clad, of Arthur's palace toward the stream, They met."—Tennyson: Lancelot and Elaine, 1, 172.

vine-culture, s. Viticulture (q. v.).

"Germany has over a hundred and fifty schools of agriculture, horticulture, arboriculture, and vine-culture, with farms, gardens, and vineyards attached."—London Daily Telegraph.

vine-disease, s.

Vegetable Pathol.: Any disease attacking the vine, spec.:

(1) That produced by the attacks of Oidium tuckeri. [VINE-MILDEW.] In general it forms a white and very delicate cottony layer upon the leaves, young shoots, and young grapes of the vine, which soon causes them to be covered by brown spots, and then become first indurated and finally destroyed. The fruit becomes abortive, or dwarfed and juiceless, and decay follows. There is a predisposition to the disease in certain states of the atmosphere. It first broke out in Kent, England, in 1845, whence it spread to the continent of Europe, to Madeira, and to the English vines introduced into America, though American vines themselves escaped. Soon after its appearance, Mr. Tucker, a gardener at Margate, England, was the first to try sulphur as a remedy. It is still the best known, and the fungus has been named after its human destroyer.

(2) A disease of the vine produced by an aphid, Phylloxera vastatrix. [PHYLLOXERA.] The parasites cause the roots to swell, and finally to be incapable of discharging their functions, so that the plant wastes away or perishes. They are as difficult to destroy as other aphides.

vine-dragon, s. An old and fruitless branch of a vine.

vine-dresser, subst. One who dresses, trims or prunes, and cultivates vines.

vine-fretter, vine-grub, s.

Entom.: Aphis vitis, a small insect that injures vines.

vine-fungus, s. [VINE-MILDEW.]

vine-grub, s. [VINE-FRETTTER.]

vine-leek, s.

Bot.: Allium ampeloprasum.

vine-mildew, vine-fungus, s.

Botany: Oidium tuckeri, a naked-spored mold which attacks the vine. [VINE-DISEASE, 1.]

vine-sawfly, s.

Entom.: Selandria vitis, a species of Sawfly, the caterpillar-like larva of which feeds on the vine.

vi-nē-āl, a. [Lat. vineus.] Relating to or consisting of vines.

vined, adj. [Eng. vin(e); -ed.] Having leaves like those of the vine; ornamented with vine leaves.

"Wreathed and vined and figured columns."—Wotton.

vin'-ē-gar, vin'-ē-gēr, vin-e-gre, vyn-e-gre, s. & a. [Lit.=sour wine, from Fr. vin=wine, and aigre=sharp, sour.]

A. As substantive:

1. Lit.: A weak solution of acetic acid, containing in most cases a certain proportion of extractive matter and mineral salts, according to the source from which it has been derived. Malt vinegar contains from four to six per cent. of real acetic acid, which is produced by the action of the acetous ferment on a fermented extract of malt and grain. It is usually of a deep red-brown color, and is the kind of vinegar most esteemed by the public. Wine vinegar made in France by the acetification of poor and weak wines, contains usually the same amount of acetic acid as malt vinegar, but possesses a different flavor. A great deal of vinegar is prepared from crabs or sour apples, but it has neither the flavor nor the strength of that made from wine. Cider vinegar, largely used in cider districts, is prepared by adding sugar to a very acid cider, and allowing it to stand in a warm room for some time, or is simply expressed from crab apples, when it is known as crab-vinegar. German vinegar is made by passing weak alcohol over wood shavings in presence of air. The acetification proceeds much more rapidly than in the case of malt vinegar, but the flavor is not so good. Distilled vinegar (white vinegar), i. e., malt or wine vinegar, which has been subjected to distillation, contains from five to seven per cent. of acetic acid, and also some of the essential principles present in the vinegar from which it is derived. Wood vinegar is crude acetic acid produced in the destructive distillation of wood. When highly purified and diluted, it is not unfrequently sold as white vinegar. [ACETIC-ACID.] Vinegar is largely used as a condiment in cookery, salads, &c., and as a preservative ingredient in pickles. Taken internally, it is a refrigerant. Much diluted, it may be used to sponge the body in fever, to check excessive perspiration, and as an ingredient in cooling lotions.

2. Fig.: Anything really or metaphorically sour; sourness of temper.

"There's vinegar and pepper in it."—Shakesp. Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

B. As adj.: Sour, crabbed.

"And other of such vinegar aspect, That they'll not show their teeth in way of smile Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable."—Shakesp. Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

Vinegar Bible, s. A Bible printed A. D. 1717 at the Clarendon Press in Oxford. So named because in the running headline of Luke xxii. vineyard was misprinted vinegar.

vinegar-cruet, s. A small glass bottle for holding vinegar.

vinegar-eel, s.

Zool.: Anguillula aceti, a microscopic nematoid worm, narrowed posteriorly, and terminated by a drawn-out point; oesophagus cylindrical. Formerly found very commonly in vinegar, but now rarely met with, owing to the absence of mucilage from the more modern vinegar and the presence of sulphuric acid.

vinegar-plant, s.

Botany:

(1) Penicillium glaucum, a mold found in layers on the surface of saccharine liquids undergoing acetous fermentation, which it tends greatly to aid. Under the microscope, the fungoid layers are found to consist of interlaced and branched threads.

(2) [VINEGAR-TREE.]

vinegar-tree, s.

Bot.: Rhus typhina, Staghorn Sumac, a tree or shrub with eight to ten pinnate leaflets and an odd one. Its fruit is so sour that it is used in the United States, where it grows, as a substitute for vinegar.

vinegar-yard, s. A yard where vinegar is made and kept.

vin'-ē-gar, v. t. [VINEGAR, s.]

1. To make into vinegar; to make sour with or as with vinegar.

2. To apply vinegar to; to pour vinegar over. (See extract under TITILLATE, B. 1.)

vin'-ē-gar-ette, s. [VINAIGRETTE.]

vin'-ē-gar-ē, adj. [Eng. vinegar; -y.] Sour, sharp, crabbed.

"In a vinegary, snappish way."—Fenn; Man with a Shadow, ch. xlv.

vin'-ēr, s. [Eng. vin(e); -er.]

1. A vine-dresser.

2. A member of the Vintners' Company. [VINTNER, 1.]

vin'-ēr-ē, vyn-er-y, s. [Eng. vine; -ry.]

*1. A vineyard.

"The vynerie of Ramer."—Fabyan: Chronicle (an. 8).

2. A kind of greenhouse in which vines are cultivated and grapes are ripened by artificial heat from stoves or flues.

vineter, viniter, s. [Fr. vinetier.] A vintner (q. v.).

"The Mayor was viniter hii breke the viniterie."

Robert of Gloucester, p. 542.

vi-nētte, s. [A dimin. from vine.] A sprig or branch. (Prov.)

vin'-ew (ew as ū), s. [VINEWED.] Moldiness.

"Soon would it catch a vinew, begin to putrifie, and so continue but a while."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xix., ch. iii.

vin'-ewed, vin'-newed (ew as ū), adj. [Prop. finewed, from A. S. finegan, fynegian=to become moldy or musty, from finig, fyneig=moldy.] Moldy, musty.

"Many of Chaucer's words are become, as it were, vinew'd and hoarie with over long lying."—Beaumont: Letter to Speght. (Chaucer, 1602.)

vin'-ewed-ness, vin'-newed-ness (ew as ū), s. [Eng. vinewed; -ness.] The quality or state of being vinewed or moldy; moldiness, mold.

"Hoariness or vinnewedness, such as is on bread or meat long kept."—Barrett: Alvearie, in voce Hoarie.

vine'-yard, vine-yarde, vyn-yerd, s. [A. S. winegærd.] A plantation of vines producing grapes.

"For thrice, at least, in compass of the year, Thy vineyard must employ the sturdy steer."

Dryden: Virgil; Georgics ii. 551.

vingtaine (as vañ-tān'), subst. [Fr.=a score.] One of the divisions into which the parishes in Jersey are divided.

vingtenier (as vañ-tā-nyē), s. [VINGTAINE.] A collector of rates in the vingtaines of Jersey, Eng.

vingt et un (as vañt-ē-ūn), s. [Fr.=twenty-one.]

Cards: A game in which the object is to make the number or value of the pips on the cards as nearly as possible twenty-one.

vin'-ic, a. [Lat. vin(um)=wine; Eng. adj. suff. -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from wine.

vin-i-făc'-têur, s. [Fr.] An apparatus for collecting the alcoholic vapors that escape from liquids during the process of vinous fermentation.

boil, boÿ; pout, jowl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; -tion, -gion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

It is a conical vessel or cap, covering a hole in the top of the fermenting-tun, which is in other respects made air-tight. The conical vessel is surrounded by a reservoir of cold water, so that the spirituous vapors rising from the liquid will be condensed on the side of the reservoir, and, running down its sides, be returned to the tun. A tube carries off uncondensed vapors.

vī-nīf'-ēr-æ, s. pl. [Lat. vinum=wine, and fero=to bear.]

Bot.: Jussieu's name for the Vitaceæ (q. v.).

vīnīter, s. [VINETER.]

vīnīterie, s. [VINTRY.]

vīn'-newed (ew as ū), a. [VINEWED.]

vīn'-nŷ, a. [A. S. finig, fynig.] Moldy, musty, vinewed.

vī'-nō-lēn-çŷ, s. [Lat. vinolentia, from vinum=wine.] Drunkenness; tippling.

vī'-nō-lent, a. [Lat. vinolentus, from vinum=wine.] Drunken; given to tippling.

"Than wol they sain thou art a great gloton,

A devourer, or els vinolent."

A Ballad of Good Counsaill.

vī-nōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Lat. vinum=wine, and Eng. meter.] A form of hydrometer for measuring the strength of wine.

vin ordinaire (as van or-dī-nār'), s. [French=ordinary wine.] A kind of cheap claret. Also applied to the cheaper varieties of many kinds of wine, white or red; the common wine of the country.

vī'-nōse, a. [VINOUS.]

vī-nōs'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. vinos(e); -ity.] The quality or state of being vinous.

vīn'-ōūs, vī'-nōse, a. [Lat. vinosus, from vinum=wine.] Having the qualities of wine; pertaining to wine.

"Water will imbibe
The small remains of spirit, and acquire A vinous flavor." J. Philips: Cider, ii.

vinous-fermentation, s. Alcoholic fermentation. [FERMENTATION, II.]

vīn'-quish, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A disease in sheep, in which they pine and languish away.

vīnt, v. t. [From vintage (q. v.).] To gather at the vintage; to make into wine.

"I wouldn't give a straw for the best wine that ever was vinted."—Trollope: Barchester Towers, ch. xxi.

vīnt'-age (age as īg), vīnt'-age, s. [A corrupt. of Mid. Eng. vindage, vendage, ventage, for vendange; Fr. vendange, vendenge=a vintage, from Lat. vindemia=a vintage, from vinum=(1) wine, (2) grapes, and demo=to take away, from de=off, away, and emo=to take.]

1. The produce of the vine for a particular season.
2. The wine produced by the crop of grapes in one season; as, the vintage of 1874.
3. The time of gathering the crop of grapes.

"The grape-gatherer in time of vintage."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xiv., ch. i.

4. Wine generally. (Tennyson: Will Waterproof, 97.)

vintage-spring, s. A wine-fount.

vīnt'-age (age as īg), v. t. [VINTAGE, s.] To gather, as grapes, at the vintage.

vīnt'-ag-ēr (ag as īg), s. [Eng. vintag(e); -er.] One who gathers the vintage.

"The star named in Latine Vindemiator, i. e. the vintager."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xviii., ch. xxxi.

vīnt'-ag-īng (ag as īg), subst. [Eng. vintag(e); -ing.] The act of gathering a vintage.

vīnt'-nēr, vīnt-on-ner, vīnte-ner, vīnte-nerē, s. [Prop. vineter, from Fr. vinetier; Low Lat. vinetarius=a wine-seller, from Lat. vinetum=a vineyard, from vinum=wine.] One who deals in wine; a licensed victualer, a wine-dealer; a tavern-keeper.

"He staved all the wine in a vintner's cellar."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

vīnt'-nēr-ŷ, s. [Eng. vintner; -y.] The trade or occupation of a vintner.

"The father of him did . . . perform cookery and vintnery."—Carlyle: Fr. Revolution, pt. ii., bk. v., ch. ii.

vīnt'-rŷ, vīnt-rie, s. [A contraction for viniterie (q. v.).] [VINTNER.] A place where wine is stored or sold.

vīn'-ŷ, a. [Eng. vine; -y.] Pertaining or relating to vines; producing vines, abounding in vines.

"From thence he furrow'd many a churlish sea,
The vin Rhene, and Volgha's self did pass,"
P. Fletcher: Piscatory Eclogues, ii.

vīn'-ŷl, s. [Lat. vin(um)=wine; -yl.]

Chem.: C_2H_3 . The hypothetical radical of vinyl alcohol.

vinyl-alcohol, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_4O = \frac{C_2H_3}{HO}$. The name applied to the pungent liquid supposed to be the first member of the allyl series of alcohols, and obtained by agitating acetylene, C_2H_2 , with sulphuric acid, and distilling. It has since been shown to correspond with crotonic aldehyde.

vinyl-chloride, s.

Chem.: C_2H_3Cl . A gas having an alliaceous odor, and liquefying at 18° . It is obtained by first forming ethene chloride, $C_2H_4Cl_2$, and then treating it with silver oxide, $2C_2H_4Cl_2 + Ag_2O = 2C_2H_3Cl + 2AgCl + H_2O$. The bromide and iodide are similarly formed.

vī'-ōl (1), vī'-al, vī-oll, vy-ol, s. [Fr. viola, violle; Prov. viola, viula, from Low Lat. vitula, vidula=a viol, from Lat. vitulor=to celebrate a festival, keep a holiday, prop.=to sacrifice a calf, from vitulus=a calf; Sp., Port. & Ital. viola. Viol and fiddle are doublets.]

Music: A stringed instrument a little larger than the violin; it was furnished with five or six strings, had a fretted finger-board, and was played with a bow. The viol is found depicted in MSS. as early as the eleventh century. In France, Germany, and Italy the number of the strings varied between three and six. It is supposed that they were tuned in fourths and thirds. A chest of viols consisted of six instruments of various sizes, the smaller ones were called treble, the next mean, and the larger bass viols: The treble viol was somewhat larger than the violin, and the music for it was written in the treble clef; the mean (or tenor) viol was about the same length and breadth as the modern tenor violin, but was thicker in the body; its music was written in the C clef. The bass viol was much about the same size as the violoncello, and the music for it was written in the bass clef.

"His heart dances to the melody of the harp and the viol; he pampers every bodily sense, till pleasure itself is converted into pain or insensibility."—Knox: Christian Philosophy, § 66.

Music: An obsolete instrument of the violin family. In addition to catgut strings, metal strings were placed under the finger-board, which, by the production of sympathetic sounds, gave a peculiar quality of tone to the instrument. [VIOLET, (2).]

vī'-ōl (2), s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Naut.: A large messenger used in weighing an anchor by the capstan.

viol-block, s.

Naut.: A large snatch-block (q. v.).

vī'-ō-lā (1), s. [Ital.] [VIOL, (1).]

Music: The tenor violin. It has four strings, A, D, G, C. The two lowest are covered strings. Music for this instrument is written in the alto clef, whence it is sometimes called alto viola.

viola-bastarda, s. [VIOLA-POMPOSA.]

viola da gamba, s. [GAMBA.]

viola di bordone, s.

Music: An instrument of the violin kind, strung with six or seven catgut strings, C, B, G, D, A, E, C. Beneath the gut were metal strings varying in number from sixteen to as many as forty-four, arranged in a diatonic order. The sympathetic strings were occasionally plucked with the left hand in playing. The instrument is now obsolete. It was also called viola di fagatto, viola bastarda, and barytone.

viola-pomposa, s.

Music: A species of viola da gamba, invented by John Sebastian Bach. It had five strings; the four lower strings were tuned in fifths, and the fifth string was tuned to E, by means of which greater facility in the execution of extended passages was possible.

vī'-ō-lā (2), s. [Lat.=a violet.]

Bot.: Violet; the typical genus of Violeæ (q. v.). Low herbs, more rarely shrubs, with radical or alternate leaves or flowers; on one, rarely on two-flowered peduncles; calyx of five sepals, extended at the base; petals five, unequal, the under one spurred at the base; anthers connate, two of them spurred behind; capsule of three elastic valves; seeds ovoid or globose. Known species a hundred, from temperate countries. Five of the most familiar are native in temperate Europe and America: Viola palustris, the Marsh; V. odorata, the Sweet; V. hirta, the Hairy; V. canina, Gerard's or the Dog Violet; and V. tricolor, the Pansy Violet, Pansy, or Heart's-ease. The first has a subterranean creeping rootstock, glabrous stems, reniform cordate leaves, and white or lilac scentless flowers. The second has broadly cordate leaves, and fragrant blue, white, or reddish purple flowers; found in woods, pastures, or on banks. The third, with faintly scented flowers, is found chiefly in the east of England and Scotland, and parts of North America.

The fourth, with broadly cordate leaves, ciliate dentate stipules, and blue, lilac, gray, or white flowers, is common in woods, dry pastures, clefts of rocks, and banks; and the fifth, having flowers variegated, purple, white, and yellow, is frequent on banks and in fields. The bruised leaves of V. tricolor smell like peach kernels; they were once believed to be efficacious in the cure of skin diseases. The petals of V. odorata are used as a laxative for children. The seeds have similar qualities, and the root is emetic and purgative. V. ovata is a reputed antidote to the poison of the rattlesnake. V. serpens, a small, procumbent, Himalayan herb, yields an oil. The flowers are considered diaphoretic and laxative, the seeds diuretic and emetic.

viola-emetin, s. [VIOLIN (2).]

vī'-ō-lā-ble, a. [Lat. violabilis, from violo=to violate (q. v.).] Capable of being violated, broken, or injured.

vī'-ō-lā-çŷ-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin viol(a); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Violetworts; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, the typical one of the alliance Violales. Herbs or shrubs, with simple, usually alternate leaves, involute in vernation. Sepals five, persistent, generally elongated at the base; aestivation imbricated; petals five, aestivation convolute; stamens five, inserted on a hypogynous disk; filaments dilated, lengthened beyond the anthers, two, when the flowers are irregular, often with an appendage or gland at the base; style single, usually declinate; stigma oblique, hooded; ovary one-celled, with three parietal placentæ, rarely one-seeded; capsule three-valved, having the placentæ in their axis. Roots often emetic. Found in most continents, but the typical species are from the North Temperate Zone. Tribes or sub-orders two: Violeæ and Alsodeæ. Known genera eleven, species 300 (Lindley); genera twenty-one, species 240 (Sir J. Hooker).

vī'-ō-lā-ceōūs (ce as sh), a. [Lat. violaceus, from viola=a violet.] Resembling a violet in color.

vī'-ō-lāl, a. [VIOALES.]

Bot.: Resembling the genus viola, or the order Violaceæ, as the Violal alliance.

vī'-ō-lā-lēs, s. pl. [Masc. and fem. pl. of Mod. Lat. violalis, from Lat. viola (q. v.).]

Bot.: The Violal alliance; an alliance of Hypogynous Exogens. Flowers monodichlamydeous, placentæ parietal or sutural, embryo straight, with little or no albumen. Twelve orders, viz.: Flacourtiaceæ, Lacisternaceæ, Samydaceæ, Passifloraceæ, Malesherbiaceæ, Moringaceæ, Violaceæ, Frankeniaceæ, Tamaricaceæ, Sauvagesiaceæ, Crassulaceæ, and Turneraceæ.

vī'-ō-lān, s. [Lat. viol(a)=the violet; Eng. suff. -an.]

Min.: A member of the group of pyroxenes, occurring mostly massive or fibrous, though crystals are occasionally met with. Color, dark violet-blue. Found in small seams with various other minerals in the braunite of San Marcel, Val d'Aosta, Piedmont.

vī'-ō-lān'-tīn, s. [English viol(et), and (allox)-antin.]

Chemistry: $C_8H_6N_6O_9$. A compound obtained by heating hydruilic acid with dilute nitric acid. It separates as a yellowish-white crystalline mass, and contains the elements of violuric and dilituric acids, and is resolved into these two acids by simple treatment with water. Vapor of ammonia colors violent blue.

vī'-ō-lāte, vy-o-late, v. t. [Lat. violatus, pa. par. violo=to treat with force, to violate; from the same root as vis=force.]

*1. To treat roughly and injuriously; to do violence to; to outrage, to injure.

"He who attempts to violate the happiness of another."—Wollaston: Religion of Nature, § 9.

2. Specifically, to outrage or deflower by force; to ravish.

3. To desecrate, to dishonor, to treat irreverently; to meddle irreverently or profanely with.

"The souldours of saynt Amande . . . burnt the towne, and vyolated the Abbey."—Berners: Froissart; Cronycle, vol. i., ch. liv.

4. To sin against; to break (as a vow); to infringe or transgress (as a law, contract, promise, or the like), either by commission or omission.

"By him the violated law speaks out Its thunders." Cowper: Task, ii. 340.

*5. To break in upon, to disturb, to interrupt.

"To violate sleep, and those Whose dwelling God hath planted here in bliss."
Milton: P. L., iv. 883.

¶ For the difference between to violate and to infringe, see INFRINGE.

vī'-ō-lā-tion, vī-o-lā-ci-on, s. [Fr. violation, from Lat. violationem, accus. of violatio, pa. par. of violo=to violate (q. v.); Sp. violacion; Italian violazione.]

"Without any violacion or breache of the Sabbath."—Udall: Marke iii.

4. The act of violating, infringing, or transgressing; infringement.

"The violation of my faith."

Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, iv. 4.

*5. The act of interrupting; interruption, disturbance.

vī'ō-lāt-ive*, a. [Eng. violat(e); -ive.] Tending to or causing violation; violating.

vī'ō-lāt-ōr, vī'ō-lāt-ēr*, s. [Latin violator, from violatus, pa. par. of violare = to violate (q. v.); Fr. violateur; Sp. & Port. violador; Ital. violatore.]

1. One who violates, injures, interrupts, or disturbs.

2. A ravisher.

"Angelo is an adult'rous thief,
An hypocrite, a virgin violator."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, v.

3. One who infringes or transgresses.

"A grievous penaltie of money being imposed upon the violators of the same statute."—Hackluyt: Voyages, i. 174.

4. One who violates, desecrates, profanes or treats with irreverence anything sacred or venerable; a desecrater; a profaner.

"But Guy de Montford was excommunicated, as a violator of the church, a murderer, and a traitor."—Holinshead: Edward I. (an. 1274).

vī'ō-lē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viol(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: The typical tribe of Violaceæ, characterized by having irregular flowers.

vī'ō-lence, vy-o-lence*, s. [Fr. violence, from Lat. violentia, from violentus = violent (q. v.); Sp. & Port. violencia; Ital. violenza.]

1. The quality or state of being violent; force; vehemence; intensity or strength of action or motion.

"Blown with restless violence round about The pendent world."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, iii. 1.

2. Power exerted unjustly or illegally; unjust force; force employed against liberty, law, rights, or the like; outrage, injury, hurt, attack, assault.

"Offer him no violence."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., i. 1.

3. Vehemence or impetuosity of feeling; excessive eagerness or ardor.

1. To do violence to; to attack, to assault, to injure.

"Nature violenced in both these."

Ben Jonson: The Devil is an Ass, ii. 2.

2. To bring by violence; to drive, to compel.

"The high court of justice, to which the loyal and the noble, the honest and the brave, were violenced by ambition and malice."—Feltham: Resolves.

vī'ō-len-çy*, subst. [Eng. violent(t); -cy.] Violence, excess.

"To avoid these violencies and extremities of nature."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, iii. 2.

vī'ō-lēn'-ic, a. [From Lat. viola = a violet (q. v.).] Derived from or contained in the violet.

violenic-acid, s.

Chem.: A colorless acid, extracted from the flowers of the violet. It crystallizes in silky needles, soluble in water, alcohol, and ether, and forms yellowish salts, which stain the skin.

vī'ō-lent, vy-o-lent*, a. & s. [Fr. violent, from Latin violentus = violent, full of might, from the same root as violate (q. v.); Sp., Port., & Ital. violento.]

A. As adjective:

1. Characterized by the exertion of force accompanied with rapidity of motion; forcible and quick or sudden; furious, impetuous; full of violence or force.

"With violenter sway fall turrets steep."

Surrey: Of the Golden Mean.

2. Produced, effected, caused, or continued by force; produced or attended by extraneous or unnatural force; unnatural.

"Die a violent death."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., i. 4.

3. Acting or produced by force and violence; characterized or effected by force or violence unjustly or unlawfully exercised; outrageous.

"Some violent hands were laid on Humphrey's life."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., iii. 2.

4. Unreasonably or excessively vehement; passionate, furious, bitter, malignant; as, a violent speech, a violent attack.

5. Acting with violence; passionate, hot-tempered.

"The man is besyde, so vyolent and so isoperdous, that none of them dare be a knowen to speake of it."—Sir T. More: Workes, p. 909.

6. Severe, acute, sharp, extreme.

"These violent delights have violent ends."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 6.

*7. Enormous, excessive, outrageous, huge.

Repair those violent harms that my two sisters
Have in thy reverence made."

Shakesp.: Lear, iv. 7.

*8. Extorted; not voluntary; not binding.

"Vows made in pain, as violent and void?"

Milton: P. L., iv. 97.

B. As subst.*: An assailant.

"Such violents shall not take heaven, but hell, by force."—Dr. H. More.

¶ When violent and furious are applied to the same objects, the latter expresses a higher degree of the former; thus a furious temper is violent to an excessive degree; a furious whirlwind is violent beyond measure.

Law: [PRESUMPTION.]

violent-profits, s. pl.

Scots Law: The penalty due by a tenant who forcibly or unwarrantably retains possession after he ought to have removed.

Music: The Viol d'Amore (q. v.).

vī'ō-lēt-wört, s. [Eng. violet (1), and wort.]

Bot. (pl.): The order Violaceæ. (Lindley.)

vī'ō-līn (1), s. [Ital. violino, dimin. from viola = a viol (q. v.).]

Music: The most familiar of all stringed instruments played with a bow. It is somewhat smaller than the old viol, as its name implies. Like the rest of the family it represents, it consists of a wooded chest of peculiar form, made of two curved surfaces, called the back and the belly, united by sides, and with a hollow on each side half-way in the length. A neck at one end serves as a finger-board, over which the four strings pass, being fastened at one end of the chest or body to a tail-piece, and kept in tune and position by a series of pegs at the head or end of the neck. The strings are raised above the belly by the bridge, supported at the point of greatest tension by a sound-post, which is fixed upright between the back and the belly. In the belly are two holes, called the f holes from their similarity to the shape of that letter. The sound is produced by drawing a bow of horse-hair charged with rosin across the strings, which are tuned in fifths, the changes of pitch being gained by "stopping" the strings with the fingers of the left hand against the finger-board, thus shortening the vibrating portion of the string. The harmonics of the violin are very telling in quality, and are produced by touching the strings lightly instead of pressing them upon the finger-board. The sordino or mute, placed upon the bridge, produces a peculiar modification of tone, and a special effect is gained by plucking the strings, as in playing a guitar. [PIZZICATO.] The violin is capable of producing a limited harmony by means of double stops and bowing in "arpeggio," while as to power of expression and execution there is no other instrument which can be compared to it. It has a wide range of sounds, to which any degree of loudness or softness, staccato or legato, can be given. Compass from G below the stave. [CREMONA.] violin-clef, s.

Music: The G clef placed upon the first line of the stave.

vī'ō-līn (2), s. [Eng. viol(et) (1); -in.]

Chem.: Viola-emetin. An emetic substance contained, according to Boullay, in all parts of the common violet. It has not been obtained pure, and is, perhaps, identical with emetin from ipeca-canha-root. (Watts.)

vī'ō-līn-çél'-lō (or as vī'ō-lōn-çhél'-lō), subst. [VIOLONCELLO.]

vī'ō-līne, s. [Eng. viol(et); -ine.]

Chem.: Price's name for the blue substance obtained by treating aniline with sulphuric acid and lead peroxide.

vi-ô-lôn-çél'-líst (or as vi-ô-lôn-çhél'-líst), s. [Eng. violoncell(o); -ist.] A performer on the violoncello.

vi-ô-lôn-çél'-lô (or as vi-ô-lôn-çhél'-lô), s. [Ital., dimin. from violone=a bass-viol.]

Music: A bow instrument of the viol class, held by the performer between the legs, and filling a place between the viola and the double-bass. It is strung with four gut strings, the lower two covered with silver wire, and tuned in fifths. The compass usually employed extends from c on the second ledger-line below the bass-staff to A on the second space of the treble, though soloists play an octave higher, with all the intermediate semitones. (Spelt also Violoncello.)

vi-ô-lô'-nê, s. [Ital.]

Music: The same as DOUBLE-BASS (q. v.).

vi-ô-loûs, a. [VIOLENT.] Violent, impetuous.

"You are so violent."

Beaum. & Flet.: Maid in the Mill, iii. 1.

vi-ô-lür'-ic, a. [English viol(antin), and uric.] Derived from or containing violantin and uric acid.

violuric-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_3N_3O_4$. Obtained by the decomposition of violantin, but best prepared by the action of a warm solution of nitrate of potassium on hydruilic acid. The salt formed is treated with chloride of barium, and the baric violurate exactly decomposed with sulphuric acid. It crystallizes in shining, yellowish, rhombic octahedrons, which dissolve moderately in cold, easily in hot water. Its salts are distinguished by the beauty and variety of their colors. The ammonium and potassium salts are deep blue, those of barium and lead being red.

vi-pär'-i-ous, a. [Lat. vi(ta)=life, and pario=to produce.] From the etym. the word would seem =life-producing; but in the example it=tenacious of life.

"A cat the most viparious is limited to nine lives."—Lytton: Caxtons, bk. xii., ch. ii.

vi-për, s. [Fr. vipère, from Lat. vipera=a viper, lit.=(the serpent) that produces living young, for vivipara, fem. of viviparus=producing live young, from vivus=alive, and pario=to bring forth; Sp. & Port. vibora; Ital. vipera.]

1. Literally and Zoölogy:

(1) The common name of a poisonous European reptile, Pelias berus or Vipera communis, of which there are two or three varieties differing slightly in color. [ADDER, I. 1., PELIAS.]

(2) A book-name for any of the Viperidæ (q. v.). They do not attain any great size, but their venom is usually very powerful; this they appear to know, for, having bitten their prey, they leave it to die, and then prepare to swallow it. The best-known species are the Common Viper (Vipera communis), from Europe; the Cerastes (V. cerastes), the Horned (V. cornuta), and the River Jack Viper (V. rhinoceros), from Africa; and Russell's Viper (Daboia russellii?), from India.

2. Fig.: A person or thing of a mischievous or malignant nature or disposition.

"Where is this viper
That would depopulate the city, and Be every man himself?"

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iii. 1.

viper-gourd, s. [TRICHOSANTHES.]

viper's bugloss, s.

1. Bot.: The genus Echium (q. v.).

2. Entom.: Dianthæcia echii, a European night-moth, family Hadenidæ. The antennæ nearly simple; fore wings ochrey, with markings and an ocellate white spot in the center. The caterpillar feeds on the Viper's bugloss, after which it is named.

viper's grass, s. [SCORZONERA.]

viper's herb, s.

Bot.: Echium vulgare. [VIPER'S BUGLOSS.]

vi-për-a, s. [VIPER.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Viperidæ (q. v.), with which Pelias is often amalgamated. Wallace puts the species at seventeen, with the range of the family. Head with shields, flat and high on sides; nostrils in middle of a shield; nose curved somewhat upward (more flat in Pelias).

vi-për-ess, vi-per-esse, s. [Eng. viper; -ess.] A female viper.

"Portia did confesse,
My sons I would have poyson'd. Viperesset!"
Stapylton: Juvenal, vi. 675.

vi-për'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viper(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zoöl.: True Vipers; a family of Viperina (q. v.), distinguished from the Crotalidæ (Pit Vipers) by the absence of any depression between the eyes and nostrils. They are especially characteristic of the Palæarctic and Ethiopian regions, only one species being found over a large part of the Oriental region, and another reaching Central India. They are very abundant in Africa and on the Palæarctic confines of south-western Asia. The Common Viper ranges across the whole Palæarctic region, from Portugal to Saghalien Island, reaching 67° N. in Scandinavia, and 58° N. in Siberia. Some authorities include the genus Acanthophis in this family, which would then be represented in the Australian region; others transfer it to the Elapidæ. Wallace, following Strauch, puts the genera at three (Vipera, Echis, and Atheris), and the species at twenty-two; Günther adds Daboia and Cerastes, which are sometimes treated as sub-genera.

2. Palæont.: An extinct species of True Viper has occurred in the Miocene of France.

vi-për'-i-form, a. [Mod. Lat. vipera, and Lat. forma=shape, appearance.] Having the form of a viper; viperine; as, viperiform snakes. (Duncan, in Cassell's Nat. Hist., iv. 300.)

vi-për'-i-na, s. pl. [VIPERINE.]

Zoöl.: A synonym of Solenoglyphia (q. v.).

vi-për'-ine, adj. & subst. [Lat. viperinus=of or belonging to a viper (q. v.) or snake.]

A. As adjective: Pertaining to a viper or vipers; specif., belonging to or having the characteristics of the Solenoglyphia (q. v.).

Vir'-gin-i-a, s. [Lat. virgo (genit. virginis) = a virgin. Named from Queen Elizabeth ("the Virgin Queen") of England.] One of the thirteen original States of the U. S. A., nicknamed "the Old Dominion," also "Mother of Presidents." Bounded W. by Kentucky and West Virginia, N. by Maryland, E. and SE. by the Potomac river and the Atlantic, and S. by Tennessee and North Carolina. Area, 42,450 square miles. Virginia is the oldest English settlement in the original thirteen States. First settlement made at Jamestown in 1607. The State has furnished the nation some of its ablest statesmen and generals, among whom were Washington, Jef-erson, Madison, Monroe, four Lees, Patrick Henry, and Chief Justice Marshall. Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe and Tyler, all presidents of the United States, were citizens of Virginia, and President W. H. Harrison was a native, though not a citizen, at the time of his election. In 1861, West Virginia was formed from the NW. portion of the State, and in June, 1863, was admitted as a separate State. Agriculture is the leading industry. Coal and iron abound. Principal cities, Richmond, the capital and metropolis; Norfolk, Portsmouth, Petersburg, Lynchburg and Roanoke.

Bot.: Ampelopsis hederacea, a shrubby climber; called also the American Joy.

Virginian-deer, s.

Zoöl.: Cervus virginianus, the "common" deer of North America. It is slightly smaller than the Fallow Deer (q. v.); reddish-yellow in summer, light gray in winter; antlers rucervine; tail about a foot and a half long. These deer are timid and wild, and therefore domesticated with difficulty. Their flesh formerly constituted the staple food of the native Indians.

Virginian eared-owl, s.

Ornith.: Bubo virginianus, a large species common over the northern states of the American Union. Length about two feet; reddish-brown on upper surface, mottled with black, and covered with regular bands of the same hue, lighter beneath; throat white; beak and claws black.

Virginian-hemp, s.

Bot.: Acnida cannabina. [ACNIDA.]

Virginian-opossum, s.

Zoöl.: Didelphys virginianum, the Common Opossum. It is about the size of a domestic cat; head long, large, and pointed, ending in a naked snout. Hair long, soft, and woolly, whitish at the roots and brownish at the tips, giving the animal a dusky appearance.

Virginian-poke, s.

Bot.: Phytolacca decandra. [PHYTOLACCA.]

Virginian-poplar, s.

Bot.: The genus Liquidambar (q. v.).

Virginian-quail, s.

Ornith.: Ortyx virginianus; ranging from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. Plumage reddish brown above, whitish yellow beneath, marked with darker shades; a white and a black band across the brow, white patch on the throat. Length about nine inches.

Virginian-silk, s.

Bot.: Periploca græca. [PERIPLOCA.]

Virginian snake-root, s.

Bot.: Polygala senega. [SENEGA.]

Virginian-stock, s.

Bot.: Malcolmia maritima, a crucifer with violet flowers growing in the south of Europe.

vir'-gin'-īc, a. [Eng. virgin(ian); -ic.] (See def. of compound.)

virginic-acid, s.

Chem.: A reddish yellow oil obtained by heating the fat-oil of the Virginian senega-root to 200°. It has a strong odor, and a sharp taste, is insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol and ether.

vir'-gin'-ī-tŷ, vir'-gin-i-tee, vir'-gin-i-tie, s. [Fr. virginité, from Lat. virginitatem, accus. of virginitas, from virgo (genit. virginis) = a virgin.] The state or condition of a virgin; virginhood; inviolate chastity; maidenhood.

"No goblin or swart faery of the mine, Hath hurtful pow'r o'er true virginity," Milton: Comus, 437.

vir'-gin-ī-ly, a. [Eng. virgin; -ly.] Befitting or becoming a virgin; maidenly.

"To bee the enclosure and tabernacle of the virginly chastitie."—Udall: Luke xxiv.

vir'-gō, s. [Lat. = a virgin.]

Astronomy: The Virgin: (1) One of the twelve ancient zodiacal constellations. It is bounded on the north by Boötes and Coma Berenices; on the south by Corvus, Crater, and Hydra. Its principal star, Alpha Virginis, is called Spica Virginis (q. v.), or simply Spica. It is in the hand of the imaginary virgin which holds ears of corn, typifying the harvest which took place in Greece while the sun passed through this part of the ecliptic. [(2)]. The next most remarkable star in Virgo is Vindemiatrix (q. v.). (2) The sixth sign of the zodiac (♍). The sun enters it about Aug. 23, and leaves it about Sept. 23.

virgo-intacta, phr.

Law: A pure virgin.

vir'-gō-leūse, s. [Fr. virgouleuse, from Virgoulée, a village near Limoges in France.] A variety of pear; the virgaloo.

vir'-gū-lār'-ī-a, s. [Lat. virgula = a little rod.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Pennatulidæ (q. v.). Shaft elongate, slender, naked below, pinnated above. Pinnæ small, unarmed.

vir'-gūle, s. [French, from Lat. virgula = (1) a little rod, (2) a critical or accentual mark, dimin. from virga = a rod.] A comma.

"In the MSS. of Chaucer the line is always broken by a cæsura in the middle, which is pointed by a virgule."—Hallam: Lit. of Middle Ages, i. 533.

vir'-gūl'-tate, a. [VIRGULE.] Rod-shaped.

vir'-gūl'-tūm, s. [Lat., contract. from virgule-tum = a bush, a thicket, from virgula = a small wand.]

Bot.: A young slender branch of a tree or shrub.

vir'-īd, adj. [Latin viridis, from vireo = to be green.] Green, verdant.

"The virid marjoram."—Crompton.

vir'-ī-dēs'-çençe, s. [Eng. viridescen(t); -ce.] The quality or state of being viridescent.

vir'-ī-dēs'-çent, adj. [Latin viridis = green.] Slightly green; greenish.

vir'-īd'-īc, a. [Lat. virid(is) = green; suff. -ic.] Green. (See compound.)

viridic-acid, s.

Chem.: Produced by oxidation of caffeotannic acid in presence of ammonia. The green color formed is precipitated by a salt of lead, and the lead compound decomposed with sulphydric-acid. On evaporation it forms a green amorphous mass, very soluble in water.

vir'-ī-din, s. [Lat. virid(is) = green; suff. -in.] [CHLOROPHYLL.]

vir'-ī-dine, s. [Lat. virid(is) = green; suff. -ine.]

Chem.: C₁₂H₁₃N. A member of the pyridine group of organic bases obtained from coal-tar and distinguished by their intolerable odor. Boiling point, 230°; specific gravity = 1.017. Is slightly soluble in water, easily in alcohol and ether.

vir'-ī-dite, s. [Latin virid(is) = green; suff. -ite (Min.).

Min.: A name given by Vogelsang to the green decomposition products found in many rocks, which are essentially hydrated silicates of protoxide of iron and magnesia.

vir'-ī-tŷ, s. [Latin viriditas, from viridis = green.] Greenness, verdure; the color of fresh vegetation; freshness.

"The apple maintaineth it selfe longest in viridity and vigor, of all other fruits."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 535.

vir'-īd-nēss, s. [Eng. virid; -ness.] Viridity, greenness.

vir'-īle, vir'-īle, s. [French viril = virile, manly, from Lat. virilis, from vir = a man, a hero; cogn. with Gr. hērōs, for vērōs = a hero; Sansc. vira = a hero, heroic; Zend. vira = a hero; Irish fear = a man; Goth. wair; A. S. wer; O. H. Ger. wer.] [VIRTUE.]

1. Pertaining to a man as opposed to a woman; belonging to the male sex.

"If there be any charm to overcome man and all his virile virtues, 'tis woman that does affect it."—Feltham: Discourse on Luke xiv. 20.

2. Pertaining to procreation; procreative.

"The knot which debilitated and enfeebled his virile inclinations."—P. Ricaut: Greek and Armenian Churches, p. 314.

3. Becoming or characteristic of a man; masculine, manly; not puerile or effeminate.

"His instrument broke for want of a firm and even hand to use it—a virile, devoted master to prolong the strain."—Scribner's Magazine, May, 1880, p. 124.

vir'-īl-ēs'-çençe, s. [Lat. virilis = virile.]

Med.: That condition in an aged woman when she assumes certain of the characteristics of the man. (Dunglison.)

vī-rīl'-ī-tŷ, s. [Fr. virilité, from Lat. virilitatem, accus. of virilitas, from virilis=virile (q. v.).]

1. The quality or state of being virile; manhood; the state of one of the male sex who has arrived at the maturity and strength of a man and has the power of procreation.

2. The power of procreation; the organs of procreation.

"For castrated animals in every species are longer lived than they which retained their virilities."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. ix.

3. Character, conduct, or habits of a man; masculine conduct or action.

"The lady made generous advances to the borders of virility."—Johnson: Rambler.

4. Manly appearance.

"Yet could they never observe and keep the virility of visage, and lyonlike look of his [Alexander]."—P. Hol. land: Plutarch, p. 1,038.

vī-rīp'-ō-tēnt, adj. [Latin vir (genit. virī)=a man, and potens (genit. potentis)=able, potent (q. v.).] Fit for a husband; marriageable.

vīr-mil-ion, s. & a. [VERMILLION.]

vī-rôle, s. [Fr., from virer=to turn, to veer.]

Her.: The hoop, ring, or mouthpiece of the bugle or hunting-horn.

vī-rôled', vī-rôlled', a. [Eng. virol(e); -ed.]

Her.: Applied to the garnishings of the bugle-horn, being the rings or rims which surround it at various parts.

vīr'-ōse, adj. [Lat. virosus, from virus=poison, virus.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: Poisonous.

2. Bot.: Emitting a fetid odor.

vīr'-tū, s. [VERTU.]

vīr'-tū-āl, a. [Fr. virtuel, as if from a Lat. virtualis, from virtus=virtue (q. v.); Span. & Port. virtual; Ital. virtuale.]

1. Having the power of acting or of invisible efficacy without the material or sensible part; proceeding from or characterized by transference of virtue, that is, force, energy, or influence.

"Heat and cold have a virtual transition, without communication of substance."—Bacon.

2. Being in essence or effect, not in fact; not actual, but equivalent, so far as effect is concerned.

"It contains all; not only in general, but in special; not only virtual, but actual."—Ep. Taylor: Dissuasive from Popery, § 3.

*3. Potential.

virtual-focus, s.

Optics: The point from which rays which have been rendered divergent by reflection or refraction appear to issue.

virtual-force, s.

Physics: A potential force; a force which, if exerted, would be capable of producing certain effects, as distinguished from one actually in operation.

virtual-image, s.

Optics: (See extract.)

"There are two cases relative to the direction of rays reflected by mirrors according as the rays after reflection are convergent or divergent. In the first case the reflected rays do not meet, but if they are supposed to be produced on the other side of the mirror, their prolongations coincide in the same point. The eye is then affected, just as if the rays proceeded from this point, and it sees an image. But the image has no real existence, the luminous rays do not come from the other side of the mirror; this appearance is called the virtual image. The images of real objects produced by plane mirrors are of this kind."—Ganot: Physics (ed. Atkinson), § 506.

virtual-velocity, s.

Mech.: The velocity which a body in equilibrium would actually acquire during the first instant of its motion in case of the equilibrium being disturbed. The proposition known as the Principle of Virtual Velocities is thus stated:

"Suppose a system of forces in equilibrium, and imagine the points of application of the forces to undergo very slight displacements, then the algebraical sum of the products of such force into its virtual velocity vanishes; and, conversely, if this sum vanishes for all possible displacements, the system of forces is in equilibrium."

Suppose that A is the point of application of a force P; conceive the point A to be moved in any direction to a new position, a, at a very slight distance, and from a draw a perpendicular, a p, on the line of action of the force P; then A p is called the virtual velocity of the point A with respect to the force P; and the complete phrase is abbreviated, sometimes into "the virtual velocity of the point A," and sometimes into "the virtual velocity of the force P." The virtual velocity is considered to be positive or negative according as p falls in the direction of P or in the opposite direction. Thus in the figure the virtual velocity is positive. (Todd-hunter.)

vīr-tū-āl'-ī-tŷ, ver-tu-al-i-ty, subst. [Eng. virtual; -ity.]

1. The quality or state of being virtual or not actual.

*2. Potentiality; potential existence.

"Se in one grain of corne . . . there lieth dormant the virtuality of many other."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vii., ch. ii.

vīr'-tū-āl-lŷ, ver-tu-al-ly, adv. [English virtual; -ly.] In a virtual manner; in effect or efficacy, if not in actuality; in effect though not materially; practically.

"The Messiah was yet virtually, though not yet corporally, among them."—Secker: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 16.

vīr'-tū-āte, v. t. [Eng. virtu(e); -ate.] To make efficacious; to give virtue or efficacy to.

"Medea now invokes the earth, aire, winds, mountains, &c., as either producing or virtuating magical ingredients."—Sandys: Ovid: Metamorphoses vii. [Note.]

vīr'-tue, ver-tu, ver-tue, ver-tew, s. [Fr. vertu, from Lat. virtutem, accus. of virtus=manly excellence, capacity, worth; from vir=a man; Sp. virtud; Port. virtude; Ital. virtù, vertù.] [VIRILE.]

*1. Manly strength or courage; bravery, valor.

"Trust to thy single virtue."—Shakesp.: Lear, v. 3.

2. Active quality or power; an inherent power; property capable of producing certain effects; strength, force, efficacy. (Frequently applied to medicinal power or efficacy.)

"The virtue of your eye must break my oath,"

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

*3. Secret agency; efficacy, without visible or material action.

"She moves the body, which she doth possess;

Yet no part toucheth, but by virtue's touch."

Davies.

*4. The essence; the very substance or best part of a thing.

"Pity is the virtue of the law."

Shakesp.: Timon, iii. 5.

"I can sing, weave, sew, and dance,

With other virtues." Shakesp.: Pericles, iv. 6.

*10. One of the orders of the celestial hierarchy. They are generally represented in art as angels in complete armor, bearing pennons and battle-axes.

"Hear, all ye Angels, Progeny of Light, Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Virtues, Powers," Milton: P. L., v. 601.

† (1) Cardinal virtues: A name for justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude.

(2) In virtue of, † By virtue of: By or through the efficacy or authority.

"You may suspect him,

By virtue of your office, to be no true man."

Shakesp.: Much Ado, iii. 3.

(3) Seven principal virtues: [SEVEN, † (6).]

(4) Theological virtues: [THEOLOGICAL-VIRTUES.]

virtue-proof, adj. Irresistible in or through virtue.

She needed, virtue-proof."

"No veil

Milton: P. L., v. 384.

vīr'-tued, adj. [Eng. virtu(e); -ed.] Endued with some power or virtue. [VIRTUE, s. 2.]

"Hath the virtued steel a power to move?"

Quarles: Emblems, V. iv. a.

vīr'-tue-fŷ, v. t. [Eng. virtue; -fy.] To give virtue to.

"It is this which virtuefies emotion, even though there be nothing virtuous which is not voluntary."—Chalmers: Constitution of Man, pt. ii.

vīr'-tue-less, ver-tue-lesse, ver-tu-lesse, adj. [Eng. virtue; -less.]

1. Destitute of virtue, efficacy, or operating qualities.

"Virtueless she wished all herbs and charms, Wherewith false men increase their patients' harms." Fairfax.

2. Destitute of excellence or merit; valueless.

"They depraed the name of Jesus, as a thyng vertuesse,"—Udall: Marke ix.

3. Destitute of virtue or moral goodness; vicious, wicked.

"Who so knoweth how nought and vertuesse he is."—Udall: Marke ii.

vīr-tū-ōs'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. virtuos(o); -ity.]

1. The study of some branch of the fine arts.

"I have been cultivating some virtuosities."—Century Magazine, June, 1883, p. 280.

2. Lovers of the fine arts collectively: the virtuosi. (Carlyle.)

vīr-tū-ō'-sō (pl. vīr-tū-ō'-sī), s. [Italian=(a.) virtuous, learned, (s.) a person skilled in the fine arts, from Lat. virtus=virtue (q. v.).] A man skilled in the fine arts, as painting, music, or sculpture; a skilled performer on some musical instrument; a connoisseur of antiquities, curiosities, and the like.

"Will had picked up a small pebble of so odd a make, that he said he would present it to a friend of his, an eminent virtuoso."—Addison: Spectator, No. 77.

vīr-tū-ō'-sō-shīp, subst. [Eng. virtuoso; -ship.] The pursuits or occupation of a virtuoso.

"Let us view philosophy, like mere virtuosship, in its usual career."—Shaftesbury: Characteristics; Misc., iii. 1.

vīr-tū-ōūs, ver-tu-ous, ver-tu-os, ver-tu-ouse, a. [Fr. vertueux, from Low Latin virtuosus, from Lat. virtus=virtue (q. v.); Span., Port., & Ital. virtuoso.]

*1. Brave, valiant, valorous, manly, strong.

"I know too well your virtuous spirit."

Chapman: Gentleman Usher, i. 1.

*2. Strong, mighty.

"Then will I to Olympus' top our virtuous empire bind." Chapman: Homer's Iliad, viii. 22.

3. Efficacious by inherent qualities; having singular qualities or powers; potent, powerful; full of virtue.

"It is a wine of virtuous powers,

My mother made it of wild flowers."

Coleridge: Christabel, i.

4. Having excellent qualities; specifically, chaste, pure, unspotted. (Applied to women.)

"The errors of men may be sufficiently refuted without satirical virulency."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 29.

vīr'-ū-lēnt, a. [Fr., from Lat. virulentus=poisonous, from virus=slime, poison; Sp., Port., & Ital. virulento.]

1. Lit.: Full of virus or poison; extremely poisonous, venomous, or actively injurious to life.

2. Fig.: Extremely bitter, acrimonious, or malignant; as, a virulent speech.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

vīr'-u-lent-ēd, a. [Eng. virulent; -ed.] Filled with virulence or venom.

"Certain spirits virulented from the inward humor."—Feltham: Resolves, pt. ii., res. 56.

vīr'-u-lent-lŷ, adv. [Eng. virulent; -ly.] In a virulent manner; poisonously; venomously; fatally; with acrimony or malignity.

vīr'-ūs, s. [Lat.=slime, poison.]

1. Lit. & Pathol.: (1) Any organic poison; any contagious or noxious matter, as the pus from an ulcer, the venom of a snake or scorpion. (2) The matter, unappreciable by the senses, which, introduced into the system, generates a specific disease; as, the variolous or the syphilitic virus. In this second sense it does not include the poison of a serpent, which is a natural secretion, while a virus is the result of some morbid action on the system.

2. Fig.: Virulence; extreme acrimony or malignity.

vīs (1), s. [Lat., pl. vires.] Force, power, strength, energy, vigor.

1. Vis acceleratrix: Accelerating force.

2. Vis impressa: Impressed force; that is, the force exerted as in moving a body or in changing its direction.

3. Vis inertiae:

(1) Lit.: The resistance of matter, as when a body at rest is set in motion, or a body in motion is brought to rest, or has its motion changed either in direction or velocity.

(2) Fig.: The resistance offered by the innate inertness of persons, or their unwillingness to alter habits, or that which is established.

4. Vis medicatrix naturæ:

Therapeutics: The power which nature has (unaided by a physician) of effecting cures.

"The body possesses a perfectly marvelous power whereby it protects itself against diseases, wards off some, cures in the best and speediest way many of those that have set in, and by a process of its own brings others more slowly to a favorable issue. This innate power is called the vis naturæ medicatrix."—Gregory: Consp. Medicinæ Theoreticæ (ed. 5th), § 65.

5. Vis mortua: Dead force; force doing no work, but merely producing pressure, as a body at rest.

6. Vis nervosa: The property of nerves by which they convey stimuli to muscles. (Quain.)

7. Vis viva: Living force; the force of a body moving against resistance, or doing work. It is expressed by the product of the mass of a body multiplied by the square of its velocity.

vīs (2), s. [Fr.=a visage, from Lat. visum, accus. of visus=the vision, sight.] [VISAGE.] Face. (Only used in the phrase vis-à-vis.)

vis-à-vis (pron. vīz-a-vī'), adv. & s. [Fr.=face to face.]

A. As adjective: In a position facing each other—standing or sitting face to face.

B. As substantive:

1. One who or that which is opposite to or face to face with another; specifically, one who faces another in certain dances, as in a quadrille.

"Miss Blanche was indeed the vis-à-vis of Miss Laura."—Thackeray: Pendennis, ch. xxvii.

2. A light town carriage for two persons, who are seated opposite each other, instead of side by side.

"Could the stage be a large vis-à-vis, Reserved for the polished and great."

H. & J. Smith: Rejected Addresses, p. 105.

vī'-ṣā, s. [VISE.] A visé.

"Were unable to obtain the Russian visa at Stockholm."—Field, April 4, 1885.

vī'-ṣā, v. t. [VISA, s.] To visé.

vīṣ'-age (age as īg), *vys-age, s. [Fr., from vis=the visage, face, from Lat. visum, accus. of visus=the vision, sight; hence, look, mien, face; prop. par. of video=to see.] The face, countenance, or look of a person or animal. (Mainly applied to human beings.)

"Representing either a human visage or that of some animal."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. iv., ch. i.

vīṣ'-age (age as īg), v. t. [VISAGE, s.] To front or face a thing.

vīṣ'-aged (aged as īgd), *vys-aged, a. [Eng. visag(e); -ed.] Having a visage, countenance, or look of a particular type.

"Grim visaged war hath smooth'd his wrinkled front."—Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 1.

vīṣ'-ard, s. [VISOR.] A mask, a visor.

vīṣ'-ard, v. t. [VISARD, s.] To mask.

vis-cā'-ṣē-æ, s. [Mod. Lat. visc(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: An order of Epigynous Exogens, alliance Asarales, proposed by Miers for the reception of Viscum and its immediate allies, which he considered more akin to Santalaceæ than to Loranthaceæ. Lindley leaves the genera in Loranthaceæ.

vis-ca'-ṣā, s. [Span.]

Zool.: Lagostomus trichodactylus, a stout-built rodent, resembling a Marmot, from eighteen inches to two feet long, exclusive of the tail, which is from from six to eight inches. Four digits on the fore, and three on the hind limbs, the latter furnished with long, compressed, and pointed nails; muffle broad, and covered with a velvet-like coat of brown hair; fur mottled gray above, yellowish-white beneath; dark band on each cheek, a white band on muzzle, running back on each side almost as far as the eye. They are nocturnal, and resemble Rabbits in their movements, but are less active. They are found on the Pampas, from Buenos Ayres to Patagonia. These animals have the strange habit of dragging all sorts of hard and apparently useless objects to the mouth of their burrow, where bones, stones, thistle-stalks, and lumps of earth may be found collected into a large heap, sufficient, according to Darwin, to fill a wheelbarrow.

Viscacha.

vis-caut'-schin (au as ōw), s. [Formed from Eng. viscous, and Ger. kautschuk (=caoutchouc), with suff. -in.]

Chemistry: The portion of crude viscin which is insoluble in alcohol and ether; specific gravity, 0.978. It is the substance to which bird-lime owes its adhesive properties, and is insoluble in alcohol and ether. Heated to 120°, it has the consistency of olive oil.

vīs'-ṣēne, subst. [Lat. visc(um)=bird-lime; suff. -ene.]

Chem.: A mobile, yellowish oil, obtained by the dry distillation of viscin. It has a specific gravity of 0.85, and distills almost completely at 226°.

vīs'-ṣēr-ā, s. pl. [Latin, pl. of viscus=an entrail.]

Anat.: The contents of the great cavities of the body, as of the skull, chest, and abdomen, but in popular language restricted to the organs of the thorax and abdomen; the bowels; the entrails.

vīs'-ṣēr-āl, a. [VISCERA.]

1. Lit.: Of or pertaining to the viscera.

"No appearance of visceral disease could be discovered."—Field, Aug. 27, 1887.

*2. Figuratively: Having fine sensibility; sensitive, tender.

"Love is of all other the inmost and most visceral affection; and therefore called by the apostle 'bowels of love.'"—Bp. Reynolds: On the Passions, ch. xi.

visceral-arch, s.

Anat. & Embryol. (pl.): A series of parallel ridges at the sides of and behind the mouth, transversely to the axis of the body. The intervals between them widen into clefts.

vīs'-ṣēr-āte, v. tran. [VISCERA.] To eviscerate (q. v.).

vīs'-ṣīd, adj. [Fr. viscide, from Latin viscidus=clammy, like bird-lime, from viscum=mistletoe, bird-lime.] Sticky or adhering, and having a ropy or glutinous consistency; semifluid and sticky; clammy.

"Gross viscid humors."—Wiseman: Surgery, bk. ii., ch. ix.

vīs'-ṣīn, s. [Lat. visc(um); -in.]

Chemistry: A waxy substance, the principal constituent of bird-lime, extracted from the stalks, leaves, and berries of the mistletoe. It is clear, colorless, inodorous, and tasteless, insoluble in water, but slightly soluble in alcohol, has the consistency of honey at ordinary temperatures, but becomes more fluid at 30°. Heated to 100°, it is as fluid as almond oil.

vīs'-ṣīn-ōl, s. [Eng. viscin; -ol.]

Chem.: A fragrant oil prepared by mixing viscene with soda-lye, and distilling the resulting crystalline mass with water.

vīs-cōn'-tī-ēl, s. [VICONTIEL.]

vīs-cōs-īm'-ē-tēr, subst. [Eng. viscosi(ty), and meter.]

Chem.: A name given by Dollfus to an apparatus for measuring the viscosity of coloring liquids thickened with gum, by comparing the time required by a given quantity of the liquid to pass through a certain aperture, with that required by an equal quantity of water. (Watts.)

vīs-cōs'-ī-tŷ, *vis-cos-i-tie, s. [Fr. viscosité, from Lat. viscosus=viscous (q. v.).]

1. The quality or state of being viscous; stickiness, glutinousness, adhesiveness, viscosity, tenacity.

"The air being mixed with the animal fluids, determines their condition as to rarity, density, viscosity, tenuity."—Arbuthnot.

2. A glutinous or viscous body or substance.

"A tenuous emanation, or continued effluvia, after some distance, retraceth unto itself, as is observable in drops of syrups and seminal viscosities."—Browne.

vīs'-cōunt (s silent), *vi-cont, *vī'-cōunt, *vi-counte, *vy-count, s. [Fr. vicomte; O. Fr. visconte, from Latin vicecomitem, accus. of vicecomes=one who fills the place of a count or earl: vice=in the place of, and comes=a companion, a count, an earl.]

*1. An officer who supplied the place of the count or earl, and acted as his deputy in the management of the affairs of the county, in reality filling the office of sheriff.

"The viscont, called either procomes or vicecomes, in time past governed in the countie vnder the earle."—Holinshed: Descr. England, bk. ii., ch. v.

2. A degree or title of nobility ranking next below an earl, and above a baron. It is the most recently established English title of nobility, having been first conferred by letters patent from Henry VI. on John Lord Beaumont, in A. D. 1440. The title of viscount is frequently held in England as the second title of an earl, and is borne by the eldest son as a courtesy title during the life of his father. The coronet of a viscount of England is composed of a circle of gold, chased, having on the edge twelve, fourteen, or sixteen pearls; the cap of crimson velvet, turned up with ermine, and closed at the top with a rich tassel of gold.

3. An officer of the Crown in Jersey, who performs the duties of an English coroner. He has a deputy viscount, who acts in his absence.

vise (3), s. [VICE, s.]

vī'-sê, v. t. [VISE (2), s.] To put a visé on; to examine and indorse, as a passport.

Vish'-noô, Vīsh'-nâ, subst. [Sans., from vis=to enter, to pervade.]

Brahmanism: The second person of the modern Hindu Trimurti (q. v.). When he first appears in Vedic times, he is simply the God of the Shining Firmament, the younger brother of Indra, and inferior to him in dignity. By the time that the epic poems, the Ramayana and the Mahabharat, were composed, Vishnu had made a considerable advance to his present position, the full attainment of which, however, was reserved for the period of the Puranas. One of these books is called the Vishnu Purana. He is regarded as the member of the Triad whose special function is to preserve. To do this he nine times successively became incarnate, and will do so once more. The first time he appeared, it was as a fish to warn a righteous king, Manu, of an approaching deluge, and save the sacred Vedas from being lost. His second appearance was as a tortoise to support the world, while the gods and goddesses churned the sea; the third, as a boar, to lift up the submerged world on his tusks; the fourth, as a man-lion, to tear to pieces an impious king; the fifth, as a dwarf, to recover for the gods their supremacy lost by their neglect; the sixth, as Parasurama, to wash away the sins of the earth by the destruction of the Kshatriya race—probably an allusion to the historic fact that when the Aryan Brahman and Kshatriya warriors had well established themselves in India, jealousies arose between them, and the Kshatriyas were vanquished, and in large measure destroyed, by the Brahmins; the seventh, as Rama, the hero of the Ramayana; the eighth, as Krishna; the ninth, as Buddha; and the tenth, as Kalki, or the White Horse, is still to come. When it arrives, Vishnu shall appear on a white horse, with a drawn sword, wherewith he shall destroy the wicked, and thus prepare the way for a renovated world. Vishnu himself is generally represented as a dark-blue man, with four arms, the first holding a war-club, the second a conch-shell, the third a quoit-like weapon called Chakra, and the fourth a water-lily. His two most popular incarnations are as Rama and Krishna. His most enthusiastic followers are generally drawn from the middle classes of Hindu society. His mark on their foreheads is a trident, with a yellow fork in the center, and a white one on each side. Many monastic sects worship him almost exclusively. [VAISHNAVA.]

vīš'-i-blī'-ī-tŷ, s. [Fr. visibilité.] The quality or state of being visible or perceivable by the eye; perceptibility, conspicuousness.

"Depict him that hath no color or figure, no parts nor body, no accidents or visibility."—Ep. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. ii., ch. ii.

vīš'-i-ble, *vys-y-ble, a. & s. [Fr., from Latin visibilis, from visus, pa. par. of video=to see; Sp. visible; Ital. visibile.]

A. As adjective:

1. Perceivable by the sight; capable of being seen; perceptible by the eye; in view.

"The visible world, the proper object of sight, is not external, but in the mind."—Reid: On the Mind, ch. vi., § 11.

2. Apparent, open, conspicuous.

"Though his actions were not visible."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iii. 4.

B. As subst.: That which is or can be seen by the eye.

"The mathematical consideration of visible figure, which we shall call the geometry of visibles."—Reid: On the Mind, ch. vi., § 8.

Visible Church, s.

Theol.: The Church, as seen by man, not as it appears to God. It includes the whole body of professing Christians, some of them regenerate, others unregenerate; the two classes commingled, as were the wheat and tares mentioned in the parable (Matt. xiii. 24-30). It is distinguished from the Invisible Church, consisting only of the regenerate; but who are worthy of this designation is known only to God. (Cf. 1 Kings xix. 10, 14, 18.)

visible-horizon, s. The line that bounds the sight.

visible-speech, subst. A term applied by its inventor, Prof. A. Melville Bell, to a system of alphabetical characters designed to represent every possible articulate utterance of the organs of speech, each organ and each mode of speech having its appropriate symbol. By means of this system the deaf and dumb are taught to speak.

vīš'-i-ble-nēss, s. [English visible; -ness.] The quality or state of being visible; visibility.

vīš'-i-blŷ, *vys-y-bly, adverb. [Eng. visibl(e); -ly.]

1. In a visible manner; so as to be perceivable by the eye; openly, manifestly, plainly, perceptibly.

"By the head we make known more visibly our supplications, our threatenings."—Dryden. (Todd.)

2. Plainly, clearly, evidently, manifestly.

"Visibly beneficial to all."—Locke: Human Understand., bk. i., ch. iii.

vīš'-īe, vīz'-īe, s. [Fr. visée=an aim, taking a sight at, from viser=to aim, to mark.] [VISE.]

1. The aim taken at an object, as by one about to shoot.

2. A scrutinizing view or look.

3. The knot or sight on the muzzle of a gun by which aim is taken.

¶ Scotch in all its senses.

Vīš'-i-gōth, s. [See def.] One of the Western Goths, or that branch of the Gothic tribes which settled in Dacia, as distinguished from the Ostrogoths, or Eastern Goths. [OSTROGOTH.]

vīs'-iōn (s as zh), vis-i-oun, *vys-y-on, *vys-ion, subst. [Fr. vision=a vision, sight, from Lat. visionem, accus. of visio=sight, from visus, pa. par. of video=to see; cogn. with Sansc. vid=to know; Goth. & A. S. witan; Eng. wit, wot.]

1. The act of seeing external objects; actual sight.

"The intuitive vision of God in the world to come."—Hooker: Eccles. Polittie, bk. i., § 11.

2. The faculty of seeing; that power or faculty by which we perceive the forms and colors of objects through the sense of sight; sight.

"And these pictures, propagated by motion along the fibers of the optic nerves into the brain, are the cause of vision."—Newton: Opticks.

3. That which is seen or perceived by the eye; an object of sight.

4. Specif., that which is seen otherwise than by the ordinary sight, or the rational eye; a supernatural, prophetic, or imaginary appearance; something seen in a trance, dream, ecstasy, or the like; a phantom, a specter, an apparition.

"Upon the foot of this construction, it is supposed that Isaiah in prophetic dream or vision heard God speaking to him (like as St. Peter heard a voice, and saw a vision, while he lay in a trance), and that in idea he transacted all that God so ordered him to do."—Waterland: Works, vi. 228.

5. Anything unreal or imaginary; a creation of fancy.

¶ Vision is the act of seeing or the thing seen; apparition, the thing that appears. Vision, signifying a thing seen, is taken for a supernatural exertion of the vision; apparition refers us to the object seen, which may be true or false, according to the manner in which it presents itself. Joseph was warned by a vision to fly into Egypt; Mary Magdalen was informed of the resurrection by an apparition; feverish people often think they see visions; timid and credulous people sometimes take trees and posts for apparitions. Strictly speaking, a phantom is a false apparition, or the appearance of a thing otherwise than it really is; thus the ignis-fatuus, or will-o'-the-wisp, is a phantom. A specter is the apparition of any spiritual being; a ghost is the spirit of a dead person appearing to the living. (Crabb.)

(1) Arc of vision:

Astron.: An arc which measures the least distance at which, after sunset, a fixed star or planet emerging from the sun's rays becomes visible.

(2) Beatific vision. [BEATIFIC.]

(3) Direct (or simple) vision:

Optics: Vision performed by means of rays passing directly or in straight lines from the radiant point to the eye. The distance at which objects can be seen with the greatest distinctness varies in different individuals, and in the same individual it is often different in the two eyes. For small objects, such as ordinary print, it is from fourteen to fifteen inches in normal cases.

(4) Field of vision:

Optics: The same as Field of view (q. v.).

(5) Reflected vision:

Optics: Vision performed by means of rays reflected, as by mirrors.

(6) Refracted vision:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. The act of visiting or of paying a visit.

"To pay Bohemia the visitation."
Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, i. 1.

2. Specifically, a formal or official visit paid periodically by a superior, inspecting, or superintending officer, or other duly qualified authority, to a corporation, college, church, or the like, for the purpose of examining into the manner in which the business of the corporation or body is carried on, how its laws and regulations are observed, and the like.

"'Will you submit,' said the bishop, 'to our visitation?'"—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

*3. The object of a visit.

"O flowers,
My early visitation and my last."
Milton: P. L., xi. 275.

4. A special dispensation or judgment sent from heaven; a communication of divine favor or goodness, but more usually of divine indignation and retribution; divine chastisement or affliction; retributive affliction or trouble.

"What will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from far?"—Isaiah x. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Anglican Church: An annual assembly, chiefly of clergy and churchwardens, called together at one or more convenient centers for the purpose of admitting churchwardens elect to office, of receiving presentments, and of officially reviewing the condition of parishes, and of the diocese or archdeaconry, in a charge by the bishop or archdeacon, founded on answers to the inquiries of the bishop to the clergy, and of the archdeacon to churchwardens, and frequently embodying digests of recent Acts of Parliament bearing on subjects of interest to the Church. The archdeacon holds his visitation annually, but delivers no charge when the bishop is "on visitation;" the bishop, for the most part, triennially. These assemblies are always very largely attended by the clergy, and much more by churchwardens than was the case a few years since.

2. Internat. Law: The act of a naval commander who visits or enters on board a vessel belonging to another state, for the purpose of ascertaining her character and object, but without claiming or exercising the right of search. The right of performing this act is called the Right of Visit, or Right of Visitation.

† (1) Order of the Visitation: An Order of nuns, founded at Annecy, in 1610, under the direction of St. Francis de Sales, then Bishop of Geneva, by St. Jane Frances de Chantal. As the object of the bishop was to make it possible for invalid ladies to join this new body, the rule, which was a modified form of the rule of St. Augustine, included few corporal austerities. At first there was no inclosure, so that the nuns could visit the sick in their own homes; but the rule of inclosure was adopted in 1618.

(2) Right of Visitation:

Internat. Law: [VISITATION, II. 2.]

(3) Visitation of the Sick:

Eccles.: An office of the Anglican Church for the comfort and consolation of sick persons. It is founded on the offices of ancient liturgies, omitting the formal procession of the priest and his clerks to the house of the sick, the saying of the Penitential Psalms, and the anointing with oil. With these exceptions, it is substantially the same as Extreme Unction (q. v.). The form for anointing was inserted in the Prayer Book of 1549, but was omitted in that of 1552.

(4) Visitation of the Virgin Mary:

Eccles.: A festival, celebrated on July 2, instituted in the middle of the fourteenth century by Pope Urban, to commemorate the Virgin's visit (Luke i. 39-56) to Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist.

vis'-mī-ā, s. [Named after M. de Visme, a merchant in Lisbon.]

Bot.: A genus of Elodeæ. Trees or shrubs, with quadrangular branches, opposite entire leaves, sometimes with glandular dots, and terminal cymes of yellow or greenish flowers. Sepals five or four; petals as many, usually villous on the inside, and with black glandular dots; stamens many, in five bundles; fruit a berry, with five cells and many seeds. Known species more than twenty, the majority from tropical America, the rest from tropical Africa. Vismia guianensis is a small Mexican and Guianan tree, about eight feet high, with ovate-lanceolate acuminate leaves, dilated at the base, smooth above, rufous beneath. The bark, leaves, and fruit, when wounded, yield a gum-resin, called in commerce American Gummi-Gutta, which, when dry, becomes hard and resembles gamboge. It is given in medicine as a purgative. V. micrantha and V. laccifera also yield a drastic gum-resin like gamboge. [ELODEA, 2.]

visne, s. [Norm. French, from Lat. vicinia=a neighborhood, from vicinus=neighboring.] Neighborhood. [VENUE.]

A. Trans.: To make visual or visible.

"What, is this me? A Voice, a Motion, an Appearance—some embodied visualised idea in the eternal mind."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. i, ch. viii.

B. Intrans.: To call up a mental image or picture with a distinctness approaching actual vision.

"All this is difficult to understand by the great majority of persons who cannot visualize."—Athenæum, March 20, 1880.

vi'-sūs, s. [Lat.=a seeing, a looking.]

Law: View or inspection. (Cowel.)

vi-tā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vit(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Vinevorts; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Berberales. Scrambling, climbing shrubs with tumid separable joints, or erect bushes; woody tissue having large, dotted ducts, at certain seasons pouring forth sap. Leaves simple or compound, the lower ones opposite, the upper alternate; peduncles racemose, often opposite, the leaves sometimes changed into tendrils; flowers small, green, in thyrses, umbels, or panicles; calyx small, its margin nearly entire; petals four or five, inserted in a disc surrounding the ovary; stamens equal in number to the petals and opposite them, also inserted in the disc; style one, very short; stigma simple; ovary superior, two to six-celled; ovules erect, definite in number; berry round, pulpy, often by abortion one-celled; seeds four or five, long. Found in the East Indies and other warm countries. Tribes two, Vitæ and Leæ; known genera seven; species 260. (Lindley.)

vit-aile, s. [VICTUALS.]

vi'-tal, *vi'-tall, *vy-tall, a. & s. [Fr. vital, from Lat. vitalis=pertaining to life, from vita=life; vita is prob. short for vivita, and allied to vivo=to live; Sp. & Port. vital; Ital. vitale.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to life, animal or vegetable.

"When I have pluck'd the rose
I cannot give it vital growth again."
Shakesp.: Othello, v. 2.

2. Contributing to life; necessary to or supporting life.

"His enfeebled spright Gan suck this vital aire into his brest."
Spenser: F. Q., II. vii. 66.

3. Containing life; life-giving.

"Vital spark of heavenly flame, Quit, oh quit this mortal frame."
Pope: Dying Christian to his Soul.

4. Being the seat of life; being that on which life depends: as, to be wounded in a vital part of the body.

5. Viable (q. v.).

"Pythagoras and Hippocrates not only affirm the birth of the seventh month to be vital."—Browne.

6. Very necessary or important; indispensable, essential.

B. As subst.: [VITALS.]

vital-affinity, s.

Chem. & Physiol.: The change in the chemical qualities in the nutrient material of a plant or animal after the former has acquired determinate form. [METABOLIC.]

vital-air, s. An old name for oxygen, as essential to animal life.

vital-capacity, s. [VITAL-VOLUME.]vital-contractility, s. [CONTRACTILITY, ¶.]vital-fluid, s.

Bot.: Latex (q. v.). (Schultz.)

vital-force, s. [VITALITY, II.]

vital-functions, subst. pl. Those functions or faculties of the body on which life immediately depends, as respiration, the circulation of the blood, &c.

vital-principle, s.

Biol.: The principle which, in association with matter, as in organized bodies, controls its manifestations and properties. Nothing is known of it, except as a force in connection with organization. (Carpenter.)

vital-vessels, s. pl.

Bot.: Laticiferous tissue (q. v.). (Schultz.)

vital-volume, vital-capacity, s.

Physiol.: Dr. Hutchinson's name for the quantity of air expired from the lungs after the most complete inspiration. It always increases with stature, and is measured by the spirometer (q. v.).

vi-tal-izm, s. [Eng. vital; -ism.]

Biol.: The doctrine which holds that the vital principle or vitality is something distinct from physical forces.

vi'-tal-ist, s. & a. [Eng. vital; -ist.]

A. As subst.: A believer or supporter of Vitalism (q. v.).

B. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to Vitalism (q. v.).

2. Of or pertaining to the Germ-theory (q. v.).

vi-tāl'-i-tŷ, subst. [Lat. vitalitas, from vitalis=vital (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The state of showing vital powers or capacities; the principle of animation or of life.

2. Animation; manifestation of life or lastingness; life; as, an institution devoid of vitality.

II. Biol.: (See extract.)

"Considered apart from the phenomena of consciousness, the phenomena of life are all dependent upon the working of the same physical and chemical forces as those which are active in the rest of the world. It may be convenient to use the terms 'vitality' and 'vital force' to denote the causes of certain great groups of natural operations, as we employ the names of 'electricity' and 'electrical force' to denote others; but it ceases to be proper to do so, if such a name implies the absurd assumption that either 'electricity' or 'vitality' are entities playing the part of efficient causes of electrical or vital phenomena."—Huxley: Anat. Invert. Anim., p. 9.

vi-tāl-i-zā'-tion, s. [Eng. vitaliz(e); -ation.] The act or process of vitalizing; the act of infusing the vital principle.

vi'-tal-ize, v. t. [Eng. vital; -ize.] To give life to; to infuse the vital principle into; to animate.

vi'-tal-ly, adv. [Eng. vital; -ly.]

1. In a vital manner; so as to give or receive life.

"New particles of matter vitally united to the living plant."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. ii, ch. xxvii.

2. Essentially, indispensably.

3. In a manner affecting the very existence of a thing; in a highly important manner or degree.

"Those whose interests were more vitally affected."—London Daily Telegraph.

vi'-talŷ, s. pl. [VITAL.]

1. The internal parts or organs of animals essential to life. (Used vaguely or generally.)

"The inexhaustible repast Drawn from his vitals."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

*2. The parts of a complex whole essential to its life, existence or soundness.

vi'-ta-scōpe, s. [Lat. vita=life, and Gr. skopeō=to see.] A device invented by Thomas A. Edison for projecting upon canvas lifelike animated pictures of moving objects taken by a kinetograph or similar instrument. It consists essentially of a stereopticon in which the gelatin photographic strips from a kinetograph (q. v.) are substituted for the ordinary stereopticon slides. As the transparent gelatin film moves past the lens, each picture stops a fraction of a second, while the light is thrown through it on the screen. Then for another small fraction of a second the light is shut off, the film moves ahead again, and another picture is flashed on the screen. This operation is carried on so fast that the eye cannot separate one view from another, and the projected image is made to appear as if in motion or endowed with life. About 2,000 photographs are used to make a picture lasting not over one minute. The vitascope reproduces photographs in colors to perfection, and by a possible phonographic attachment objects may be made to appear with the sounds which naturally accompany them. Other instruments of a similar character have been introduced under the names of biograph, cinematograph, eidoloscope, magniscope, mutoscope, zoogyroscope, etc.

vi'-tē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vit(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: The typical tribe of Vitaceæ (q. v.). Tendrils present, petals distinct, stamens also distinct; ovules in pairs.

vit'-el-lar-ŷ, s. [Latin vitellus=the yolk of an egg.] The place where the yolk of an egg swims in the white.

vi-tēl'-lī-cle, subst. [Dimin. from Lat. vitellus (q. v.).]

Biol.: The bag developed round the food-yolk, or that part of the yolk not converted into the germ-mass and embryo. The constricted part at which it is continued into the wall of the intestinal canal is called the Vitelline duct.

vi-tēl'-līn, s. [Eng. vitell(us); -in, -ine.]

Chemistry: A name formerly given to the albuminoidal substance of the yolk of birds' eggs, now known to be a mixture of albumin and casein.

vi-tēl'-line, a. [VITELLUS.]

1. Of or pertaining to the yolk of eggs, more especially to the dentoplasm.

2. Colored like the yolk of an egg; dull-yellow, just turning to red.

vitelline-duct, s. [VITELLICLE.]vitelline-membrane, s.

Anatomy: The firm, transparent, vesicular membrane surrounding the yolk of an egg; the yolk-sac. Called also Zona pellucida.

vi-tēl'-lūs, s. [Lat.=the yolk of an egg.]

1. Anat.: The yolk of an ovum or egg. It is a mass of granular protoplasm filling the vesicle, and having suspended in it a multitude of oil-globules of variable size. It contains also the germinal vesicle (q. v.) and the germinal spot or macula.

2. Botany: Gærtner's name for a fleshy sac interposed between the albumen and the ovule, and enveloping the latter. Robert Brown found that it was the sac of the amnion in a thickened state.

vi'-tēx, s. [Lat.=the chaste tree. (See def.)]

Bot.: The typical genus of Viticæ. Calyx short, campanulate, five-toothed; corolla irregular, five-lobed, somewhat labiate; stamens four, didynamous; fruit a globular berry, covered at its base by the calyx, and containing four one-seeded cells. Vitex agnus-castus is the chaste-tree, a native of Southern Europe. It has digitate leaves, with five to seven leaflets, fragrant flowers, and globular fruits with an acrid and aromatic taste. [AGNUS-CASTUS.] Vitex trifolia, the Wild Pepper, is a small tree or shrub, wild in India and Burmah. The roots yield a sweet, greenish oil. It is believed that an oil can be extracted also from the seeds. The plant is anodyne, diuretic, and emmenagogue. Vitex negundo is a shrub with pretty blue flowers, found in India, Ceylon, and Cochin China. Its ashes are largely used as an alkali in dyeing. Its root is considered by the Hindus to be tonic, febrifugal, and expectorant, and its leaves aromatic, tonic, and vermifugal; the dried fruits are also vermifugal. A pillow stuffed with the leaves is said to relieve headache, and a vapor bath prepared with them is employed in Mysore in fever, catarrh, and rheumatism. The bark and roots of V. leucocorylon, a large deciduous tree from India and Burmah, are astrigent; its fruit is eaten by the Burmese. Mr. E. B. Manson believes that its wood and that of V. altissima, the latter a large Indian tree, would be useful for furniture. The bark of V. taruma is given in Brazil in syphilitic affections.

vit'-i-âte, *vic'-i-âte (it, ic as ish), v. t. [Lat. vitatus, pa. par. of vitio=to deprave, to injure, to spoil, from vitium=vice.] [VICE, 1.]

1. To render vicious, faulty, or imperfect; to impair, to deprave, to spoil.

"Those are such as most commonly owe their being to a vitiating taste."—Wollaston: Religion of Nature, § 9.

2. To injure or impair the quality or substance of; to render noxious or injurious to health.

"The lethal gas . . . was gradually vitiating and displacing the ordinary atmosphere."—London Daily Chronicle.

3. To cause to fail of effect, either wholly or in part; to render invalid or of no effect; to destroy the validity or binding force of, as of a legal instrument; to invalidate, to annul.

"A transposition of the order of the sacramental words, in some men's opinion, vitiates baptism."—Ayliffe: Pargerson.

vit'-i-âte, *vic'-i-âte (it, ic as ish), a. [Latin vitatus.] [VITIATE, verb.] Vitiating, depraved, tainted, infected.

"Scripture adulterate and viciate with false glosses and wrong expositions."—More: Workes, p. 638.

vit-i-ā'-tion (it as ish), s. [Lat. vitiatio, from vitatus, pa. par. of vitio=to vitiate (q. v.).]

1. The act of vitiating, depraving, impairing, spoiling, or corrupting; the state of being vitiating.

"The foresaid extenuation of the body is imputed to the blood's vitiatio by malign putrid vapors smoking throughout the vessels."—Harvey: On Consumption.

2. A rendering invalid or of no effect; invalidation.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pîne, plt, sîre, sîr, marîne; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw.

vī-tīc'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viteæ (q. v.), genit. vitic(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Botany: A tribe of Verbenaceæ. Inflorescence cymose, ovules laterally attached.

vī-tīc'-ū-lā, s. [Lat.=a little vine, dimin. from vitis (q. v.).]

Bot.: The same as VINE, 2. (Fuchs.) vī-tīc'-ū-lōse, a. [Mod. Lat. viticulosus.]

Bot.: Furnished with viticulæ.

†vit'-ī-cūl-ture, s. [Fr., from Lat. vitis=a vine, and cultura=culture, cultivation.] The culture or cultivation of the vine.

"The development of viticulture in Russia."—London Daily Telegraph.

†vit'-ī-cūl-tu-rīst, s. [Eng. viticultur(e); -ist.] One engaged in the culture or cultivation of the vine; a vine-grower.

"The honest viticulturist whose money Quimby borrowed."—Town and Country Journal (Sydney), Dec. 19, 1885, p. 1282.

vī-tīl'-ī-gō, s. [Lat.=a tetter. Named from Lat. vitulus=a calf, from the glistening, veal-like appearance of the skin in this disease.]

Pathol.: A rare skin disease, order Tubercula. It is characterized by the occurrence of more or less permanent, smooth white, shining tubercles on the ears, neck, face, or on the greater part of the body, with shining papulæ intermixed. It is sometimes accompanied or produced by derangement of the liver.

vit'-ī-līt'-ī-gāte, v. i. [Lat. vitiligitum, sup. of vitiligo, from vitium=vice, and litigo=to quarrel.] [LITIGATE.] To contend in law litigiously or vexatiously.

vit'-ī-līt'-ī-gā-tion, s. [VITILITIGATE.] Vexatious or quarrelsome litigation.

"I'll force you, by right ratiocination,
To leave your vitiligation."

Butler: Hudibras, I. iii. 1, 261.

vit'-ī-ōs'-ī-tŷ (it as ish), subst. [Lat. vitiositas, from vitiosus=vicious (q. v.).] The quality or state of being vicious; depravity, corruption.

"Unless it were justly chargeable upon the vitiosity or defect of its principles or rules."—Fleydell: Sermon at Glanvill's Funeral.

vī'-tious, vī'-tious-lŷ, vī'-tious-nēss. (See VICIOUS, VICIOUSLY, &c.)

vī'-tīs, s. [Lat.=a vine.]

1. Bot.: The typical genus of the tribe Vitæ and the order Vitaceæ. Calyx generally five-toothed; petals five, cohering at the tip, falling off without separating; stamens five; style wanting; berry two-celled; cells four-seeded, the seeds often abortive. Climbing plants with tendrils opposite the leaves, which are either simple, undivided, or lobed, or are compound. Natives of Asia and North America. Vitis vinifera is the Vine (q. v.). V. indica, which grows in the west of the peninsula, from the Konkan southward, has a round fruit about as large as a currant. V. lanata, from the Himalayas, &c., has purple fruit the size of a pea. The leaves and young shoots of V. quadrangularis, another Indian species, are powdered and given by the Hindus in bowel complaints. Every part of V. setosa, also from India, is acrid, and the leaves toasted and oiled are applied in India to indolent tumors to bring on suppuration.

2. Palæobot.: A species. Vitis britannica, is in the Bovey Tracey Oligocene (?) beds, and three others in the Miocene. (Etheridge.)

†vit'-rē-a, s. pl. [Neuter pl. of Latin vitreus=glassy, from vitrum=glass.]

Zool.: An old synonym of Hexactinellidæ (q. v.).

vīt-rē-ō, pref. [VITREOUS.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling glass.

vitreo-electric, adj. Containing or exhibiting positive electricity (q. v.).

vīt-rē-ōūs, adj. [Latin vitreus, vitrius=glassy, from vitrum=glass, prop. vidtrum=an instrument or material for seeing with, from video=to see; Fr. vitre; Sp. & Port. vitreo.]

1. Of or pertaining to glass; obtained from glass.

2. Consisting of or composed of glass.

3. Resembling glass; glassy. Used in describing the luster of various minerals and rocks.

† Vitreous copper=Chalcocite; Vitreous silver=Argentite.

vitreous body or humor, s.

Anat.: A body or humor occupying the center of the eyeball. It is of gelatinous consistency, is quite pellucid, and constitutes four-fifths of the eyeball. It is surrounded except front by a hyaloid membrane.

vitreous-electricity, s.

Elect.: Positive electricity (q. v.).

vitreous-foraminifera, s.

Zool.: Foraminifera with a glassy test.

vitreous-fusion, s. The intermediate, soft condition of iron, glass, &c., between rigidity and fluidity.

vitreous-rocks, s. pl.

Petrol.: A class of eruptive rocks having glassy luster, conchoidal fracture, and only single refraction. They are obsidian, pitchstone, perlite, pumice, and tachylyte.

vitreous-sponges, s. pl. [VITREA.]

vitreous-table, s.

Anat.: The inner table or bony layer of the cranium. It is close-grained, shining, hard, and brittle.

vīt-rē-ōūs-nēss, subst. [Eng. vitreous; -ness.] The quality or state of being vitreous; resemblance to glass.

vī-trēs'-çençe, s. [Eng. vitrescen(t); -ce.] The quality or state of being vitrescent; a tendency to become glassy; susceptibility of being formed into glass; glassiness.

vī-trēs'-çent, a. [Lat. vitrum=glass.] Tending to become glass or glassy; susceptible of being formed into glass.

vī-trēs'-çi-ble, a. [Lat. vitrum=glass.] Capable of being vitrified; vitrifiable.

vīt-ric, adj. [Lat. vitrum=glass; Eng. adj. suff. -ic.] Of or pertaining to the fused compounds in which silice predominates, such as glass and some of the enamels, in contradistinction to ceramic.

vīt-rī-fāc-tion, subst. [Lat. vitrum=glass, and facio=to make.] The art, process, or operation of vitrifying, or of converting into glass, or a glassy substance, by heat.

vīt-rī-fāc-ture, subst. [VITRIFICATION.] The manufacture of glass.

vīt-rī-fī-a-ble, a. [Eng. vitriify; -able.] Capable of being vitrified or converted into glass by heat and fusion.

"I remarked that at Dun Mac Sniochain itself the materials of the hill itself were not vitrifiable."—Macculloch: Highlands and Western Isles of Scotland, i. 292.

vitriifiable-colors, subst. pl. Metallic pigments which become vitrified when laid on surfaces. Such are used in enamels, pottery, and stained glass.

vī-trīf'-īc-a-ble, a. [Eng. vitriify; c connect., and suff. -able.] Capable of being converted into glass; vitrifiable.

vī-trīf'-ī-cāte, v. t. [Latin vitrum=glass, and facio=to make.] To convert into glass or a glassy substance; to vitrify.

"We have glasses of divers kinds, and amongst them some of metals vitrified, and other materials."—Bacon: New Atlantis.

vīt-rī-fī-cā-tion, s. [French.] [VITRIFICATE.] The act or process of converting into glass by means of heat.

"Therefore vitrification maketh bodies brittle."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. v.

vīt-rī-fīed, pa. par. & a. [VITRIFY.]

A. As pa. par. (See the verb.)

B. As adj.: Converted into glass or a glassy substance.

vitriified-forts, s. pl. A class of prehistoric hill fortresses, principally found on the crests of hills in the Scotch Highlands, but occurring also in France, the walls of which are partially or entirely transformed into a glassy substance. The Scotch vitrified forts were first made known, in 1777, in a series of published letters to G. C. M., Esq., Edinburgh, by Mr. John Williams, a civil engineer, who was then conducting mining operations in the Scottish Highlands under the Board of Annexed (i. e. Forfeited) Estates. Williams' discovery was first doubted, then discussion arose whether the vitrified forts were extinct volcanoes or artificial productions. Now the volcanic hypothesis is quite exploded, and the erections are regarded as old forts. Their vitrification seems to have been intentional, and to have been facilitated by the employment of rocks easy of fusion, such as granite, limestone, &c., these being often brought from a distance when less fusible rocks might have easily been obtained from the vicinity.

vīt-rī-form, a. [Lat. vitrum=glass, and forma=form.] Having the form or appearance of glass; resembling glass.

vīt-rī-fŷ, v. t. & i. [Fr. vitrier, from Lat. vitrum=glass, and facio (pass. fio)=to make.]

A. Trans.: To convert into glass or a glassy substance by heat and fusion.

B. Intrans.: To become glass; to be converted into glass.

"Besides we see metals will vitrify."—Bacon: Physiological Remains.

vī-trī'-nā, s. [Mod. Latin, from Latin vitrum=glass.]

Zoology: Glass-snail; a genus of Helicidæ, with eighty-seven species, most abundant in northern parts of the Old World. Shell imperforate, very thin, depressed; spire short, last whorl large; animal elongated, too large for complete retraction into shell. The species are occasionally animal-feeders, like the slugs.

vīt-rī-ōl, vit-ri-ole, subst. [Fr. vitriol; Prov. vetriole; Sp. & Port. vitriolo; Ital. vitriuolo; Low Lat. vitriolum, from Lat. vitrum=glass. Named perhaps from its color and translucency.]

Chem.: An old name for sulphates, still often used in commerce, and sometimes erroneously applied to sulphuric acid. The vitriols are distinguished by their colors or the metals they contain: White, or Zinc Vitriol; Green, or Iron Vitriol; Lead and Nickel Vitriols, &c.

† Oil of vitriol: [SULPHURIC-ACID.]

vitriol-ocher, s.

Min.: The same as GLOCKERITE (q. v.).

vitriol-throwing, s.

1. Lit.: The act of throwing vitriol in the face of a person as an act of private vengeance.

2. Fig.: Violent abuse.

"This sort of vitriol-throwing is not even effective as controversy."—St. James's Gazette, Dec. 13, 1887.

†vīt-rī-ō-lāte, v. t. [English vitriol; -ate.] To convert into a vitriol, as iron pyrites, by the absorption of oxygen, which reduces the iron to an oxide and the sulphur to sulphuric acid. Thus, the sulphide of iron, when vitriolated, becomes sulphate of iron, or green vitriol.

vīt-rī-ō-lāte, vīt-rī-ō-lāt-ēd, adj. [VITRIOLATE, v.]

1. Converted into a sulphate or a vitriol.
